Cannot Announce Drawings and Raffles.

Under a recent ruling of the Post-office Department at Washington newspapers are forbidden to publish any announcement of or reference to any drawing or raffle, under penalty of exclusion from the mails.

The order says that the terms of the law bar "endless chain" enterprises, socalled "gift concerts" or similar enterprises offering prizes depending on lot or chance, including "guessing" or "estimating" contests for prizes, as well as drawings and raffles of every kind, whether general or local, for money or otherwise, for private gain or in aid of charities, educational or religious objects.

Publications, circulars, cards or pamphlets containing advertisements or other information relating to such enterprises are required to be withdrawn from the mails.

THE REPUBLICAN'S friends, therefore, will understand why we cannot announce anything in connection with drawings or raffles hereafter in these columns.

The Board of Election Supervisors, composed of Messrs. C. M. Miller Edmund Jamison and Edward E. Sollars, met at the Board room on last Saturday when they appointed registration officers, who will also serve as judges of election, for the registration and election this fall. The official list, published by order of the Board, will be found elsewhere in these columns today.

LUTHERANS WILL BUILD.

Plans for New Church Adopted Last Thursday Night.

The building committee of St. Mark's Lutheran congregation met on last Thursday night when the plans for the proposed new church were adopted and the contract for specifications, drawings, etc., was awarded Mr. J. C. Fulton, of Uniontown, Pa., who met with the committee and explained in detail the preliminary plans submitted to the committee several weeks ago by Mr. Fulton.

The building will be erected of Ohio gray brick and will contain a basement for Sunday school and social purposes, besides a kitchen, coal room, heaters, toiler room, etc. The upper floor will contain the auditorium, forty feet square, and will be capable of seating two hundred and fifty persons. Above the cloister, which will be open, will be a balcony with a capacity of one hundred persons. The altar will be in the rear of the pulpit, to the right of which will be the pastor's study fitted with a grate for heating purposes and to the left will be the organ alcove. The floor of the auditorium will be slightly elevated. The windows will be pivoted at top and bottom.

Horse or Automobile.

You read every day of horses being frightened by automobiles, but you never hear of an automobile being frightened by a horse. That simple statement settles the question of the permanency of the automobile's advent. The mechanical way is surer than any which trusts to an animal. You can drive an automobile for hours as fast as the law allows, and even faster than that, and it will be even a bit fitted to go on doing more than when you started, but treat a horse in that way and the human society would be after you. You can stop an automobile almost instanter, but when you try that on a horse you are liable to throw him down, and almost certain to strain him to his permanent injury. The few people who still insist that the automobile is a fad, merely mean that it is a thing that passes them on the road. It is a thing that has already become indispensable.—Hartford (Conn.) Courant.

HE WILL RETURN TO THE BENCH

Senator McComas Has Been Appointed By the President.

WILL QUALIFY ON NEXT SATURDAY

Justice Morris of the District Court of Appeals, Whom Mr. McComas is to Succeed, Applied to the Department for Retirement.

Associate Justice Martin F. Morris, of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, on Monday made formal application to the Department of Justice for retirement and sent his resignation to the White House. Immediately after the receipt of the resignation the President signed the appointment of ex-Senator Louis E. McComas, of Maryland, to the vacancy thus created on the bench, a position which the President had promised to Mr. McComas some months ago.

The signing of Mr. McComas' certificate of appointment took place five minutes after the receipt of Justice Morris' resignation and was the last official act of the President prior to his departure for Oyster Bay. The resignation of Judge Morris will take effect next Friday, June 30, and Senator McComas will qualify as his successor on Saturday, July 1.

Ex-senator McComas was at his K street residence late Monday afternoon when his appointment was announced. When he was asked as to his plans Mr. McComas said that he would spend the time up to July 15 winding up his law affairs and attending to certain personal matters. He will divide his time about equally between his Springfield farm home in Western Maryland, between Hagerstown and Williamsport, and the office of his law firm in Baltimore and in Washington. About July 15 he will go to Detroit, Mich., to visit his only daughter, formerly Miss Mary McComas, now the wife of Clinton G. Edgar, of Detroit. Judge McComas will spend six weeks at the home of his daughter and son-in-law. Part of the time that he is away will be spent across the border in Canada. Judge McComas will return to Washington about September 1, in anticipation of the opening of the fall term of the court, in October.

Devotion To American Ideals.

At the annual Diocesan Convention of the Episcopal Church of Connecticut, June 13, Bishop Brewster delivered a sermon in which the following remarks are found: "Our fellow citizens of foreign birth often shame us by their devotion to American ideals and by their spirit of sacrifice. The real danger to American institutions lies in our degenerate men of American birth. It is they, who to use the words of one of them, 'want to know what there is in it for me.'"

Every one who has been brought into contact with a large number of foreign-born citizens will acquiesce in the truth of the Bishop's statement. The native citizen has always exercised the right of voting and he does not value it as highly as those who never took part in the government of the country of their birth. The great masses of the foreigners are generally more enthusiastic about our institutions than we are ourselves. One of the most remarkable incidents of our time is the readiness by which these great masses of strangers becomes incorporated in the body of our people. Nothing exactly like this has ever occurred in the history of the world hitherto, nor does the transportation of strangers so readily take place in any other country as it does in the United states.

America does not want the "scum" of the old world, but there is plenty of room in this fair land for men of industry, thrift and character—men who love liberty and who are willing to leave home and country and friends and cast their lot in this land of the free.

A Review For The Half-Year.

Under the International System, which undertakes to complete the circuit of the Bible once in seven years, a return is now made to the Old Testament after six months spent upon the life of Jesus. The narrative is taken up just where it was dropped; namely, with the history of Judas, which is brought down to the latest date. The kingdom of Israel had passed out of existence through the Assyrian conquest. Rome was only half a century old. Kings had ceased in Greece, and the chief magistrates (archons) were ruling in their stead. Assyria was the supreme world-power. The discovery of the royal library at Nineveh, with its ten thousand inscribed tablets, furnishes remarkable confirmation of the records. Sennacherib, Hezekiah, Isaiah, Josiah, Jehoiakim, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Ezra, Zechariah, Esther, Nehemiah, Malachi, are some of the characters, good and evil, that will pass in review. The Assyrian invasion, the finding of the Bible (the book of the law), the Babylonian captivity, the return from exile, and rebuilding of the temple are some of the events.

Sennacherib's Invasion.

The Nile was Sennacherib's real destination. But to reach Egypt he must need pass through the tiny realm of the Hebrews. Nothing there could prove more than a momentary impediment. So thought the Nineyite. He was ignorantly omitting however, one invincible factor from his calculations. That factor was the religious faith of the people whose country he was invading.

One courageous, patriotic soul stood out against the threatening tide of invasion. The accident of royal office gave him added prestige. It was Hezekiah the king. He proceeded with utmost discretion, taking into his counsel the princes and other men of influence. While he increased the water supply of the city, he destroyed that of the district in which the enemy must needs camp. He strengthens the outer and inner fortifications of the city, and filled the arsenals with newly-made armor, offensive and defensive. He mobilized the army. He infused his own devout and dauntless spirit into the garrison, in an address which for faith and patriotism has never surpassed.

Every precaution which the king had taken to preserve the morale of the garrison was necessary. The servants of Sennacherib, captian eunuch and cup-bearer, appeared upon the neighboring hillsides and addressed the people, who crowded to the walls.

They were sappers and miners sent to honeycomb the courage of the defenders of the city. They showed Machiaveline skill; but they failed. Even the threatening letters of Sennacherib fell short of there purpose. All fiery darts were quenched by the faith of the people in God and His servant, their king.

In the last extremity Hezekiah betook himself to prayer. He believed the as yet unwritted Scripture, "The fervent effectual prayer of a righteous man availeth much." He took every precaution, as if everything depended upon himself. Then he prayed as if everything depended upon God.

We may never know the precise way in which the Assyrian host was destroyed. But deliverance came to Jerusalem. The crimson shield of Assyria covered the pillars of the temple, so lately stripped of their gold to buy a worthless truce. Sennacherib returned in defeat, to die at the hand of an assassin. A great page of world-history turned that day. On the under side Assyria disappeared, and on the upper Babylonia came into view.

The Teacher's Lantern.

The prophet Isaiah decribes the approach of the world-conqueror with nervous and poetic picturesqueness. Like a desolating tide his army reaches the height of Lebanon. The cedars feel his fire at their roots. Damascus is a heap. Hamath, Arpad, Sepharvaim, Hena, Ivah, Calmo, Carchemish, are the milestones in his march of ruin. He pauses at Michmash, the Rubicon of sacred history. Rannah, Gibeah, Geba, Benjamite cities fall in one day. Two score "fensed cities" of Judah are taken. Jerusalem alone remains inviolate, and the ruthless invader even now stands at Nob and shakes his hand defiantly at the daughter of Zion.

* * * * *

The extremity is reached. Jerusalem is an oasis in a desert of desolation. The destroying floods break in angry roar and foam about the rock of Zion. Hezekiah is as a bird shut in a cage. Sennacherib is about to thrust his hand into the holy city, as he has into the nest of every nation, and despoil it.

The dilemma is fixed. To resist means defeat, and that involves suffering, inhuman and ferocious barbarities unsurpased in history. The Assyrian bas-relievi tell how cruelly conquerors treated their prisoners of war.

* * * * *

On the other hand, surrender without resistance meant denationalization and deportion of the entire population, according to the fixed policy of Eastern conquerors. The exile would be further embittered by the importation of a heathen colony (also a part of the Eastern policy) into Judea, a motley people who would be encouraged to imitate the Hebrew ritual after the manner of the Samaritans.

* * * * *

In this darkest hour the partriotism of Hezekiah shines with incomparable splendor. He was no stoic—he was keenly sensitive to the situation. He was no hair-brained zealot, ready to impale himself on the enemy's pike. He maintained his poise. He had what has been aptly called the greatest possession; namely, self-possession.

* * * * *

Hezekiah at prayer for his nation is a scene worthy the greatest artist. Justified by the awful emergency, he probably entered the Holy of Holies, and, casting himself before the mercy-seat, spread out before the Lord Sennacherib's grevious letter.

For three thousand years the destruction of Sennacherib has stood as a glorious memorial of answer to prayer.

* * * * *

Napoleon's retreat from Russia is a modern analogy to that of Sennacherib from Jerusalem. A scant twenty thousand out of five hundred thousand French survived. The account of the fall of Sennacherib is still read in the churches of Moscow on the anniversary of the French retreat.

CONTEND 'PHONE IS FROM SATAN

Old Order German Baptists Against Modern Invention.

A dispatch from Indianapolis states that the National Conference of the Old Order German Baptists, better known as "Feet-Washing" Baptists, or Dunkards, passed a resolution ordering all members of the Church to have telephones removed from their homes and to refrain hereafter from using the same. The resolution came after a long discussion, during which it was argued that the telephone is but another ocular manifestation of the devil, whereby he shares the unwary into laziness and sloth. It was further argued that in the Scriptures there is to be found no warrant for the use of the telephone by the elect. This dispatch further states that there was but little opposition to the passage of the resolution.

Rev. J. A. Bricker, pastor of the Dunkard Church known as the Fulton Avenue Brethern, Fulton avenue, near Presstman street, Baltimore, was seen at his home Thursday, and gave the following interesting data, which lead up to the action of the Dunkard Conference:

"The Conference that passed the telephone resolutions has no representative membership in Baltimore. It is not generally known, but there are three kinds of German Baptists, or Dunkards, as we are called. The Conference known as the Progressive Dunkards left our Church some years ago, declaring that we were not moving along fast enough. They formed their own Conference, and have remained seperate since. A short time thereafter another party in the Church held that we were moving too fast, and decided to establish a Conference of their own. They were known as the Old-Order Brethren, or Dunkards. We have continued as the main Church, but are called Conservatives as a matter of distinction. All of the congregations in Baltimore are members of the Conservative body, the nearest representative of the Old Order Dunkards being at the Union Bridge, Md.

"When the Old-Order Conference was established it was decided to go back to a mode of living that was practiced by the Dunkards of 50 years before. As that has been 20 years ago, you can readily see that they intend cutting off many of the comforts of life. They decided not to have carpets in the house, no ornamentation of any kind, and in the rural districts in some cases they even took the springs out of their wagons, just because their former brethren had not been able to get hold of any.

"They refused to have any musical instrument in their homes, holding organs and pianos instruments of the devil. For some years there has been a discussion of the telephone question, not because of the fact that all of their members were using the telephone, but as a preventative measure.

"We conservative Dunkards are held to be as eccentric as our Old-Order Brethren by those who do not know. In our Church we have flourishing young people's societies and Sunday schools, and we have good singing. Our chapel on Fulton avenue is open to all, and any Christian man or woman will feel at home with us.

"There are few Old-Order Brethren in Baltimore, but they worship with us. They are old and, while they hold the views of the Old-Dunkards they are too few to organize a church of their own, so remain in the churches they belonged to before the split."

Some Pike County Doings

Abe Shorter Tells Colonel Harper About His Many Chances to Climb the Ladder of Fame.

IT was a hot day, and Abe Shorter sat on a chair under the awning of Skinner's grocery, with his feet on the head of a barrel and his head nodding with drowsiness. Colonel Harper, who had come into town and left his mule hitched in front of the postoffice, came along on his way to the drug store and halted to say:

"That yo', Abe? I declar' to goodness but I didn't know yo' at first sight. Powerful hot day in town."

"Bless me, kurnel; bless me!" exclaimed Abe in reply as he slowly lowered his legs to give the colonel the benefit of the barrel. "I was jest a-thinking about yo', kurnel—jest a-thinking and a-pondering. How's co'n a-gitting on this weather?"

"Ought to be a little mo' rain mebbe, but co'n isn't looking 'tall bad."

"And mewls hold their own, I reckon to consider?"

"Jest about hold their own, Abe; jest about."

"That's good, kurnel. If I can't hold my own I'm still glad to see other

"HAVE I BEEN ENCOURAGED IN THIS TOWN, KURNEL?"

folks do it. Things are looking up a bit for me, however. These yere Pike county scandalizers seem to have got tired of throwing me down and jumping on my body, and mebbe I'll get a chance to draw a long breath. Dawg gone folks who ain't willing for other folks to get along!"

"Scandalizing ain't right," said the colonel as he removed his hat to mop his forehead.

"Of co'se it ain't; of co'se not. Can't make a man better by scandalizing him—can't possibly do it. Can't put ambition into a man's soul by throwing him down every week or two. He's got to be encouraged if yo' want him to do his best. Have I been encouraged in this town, kurnel? Has Pike county ever extended her hand to help me climb up?"

"Reckon not, Abe."

"No, suh; no, suh, 'cept by one solitary human being, whose name is Kurnel Harper. Yo' run to co'n and mewls, an yo' work twenty-two men on yo'r plantation the year round, but that don't prevent yo' from seeing and realizing all sorts of situations. Firstly, I went into the late wah as a private soldier. I came out the same thing. Drat their pesky hides, but they were making captains and majahs and kurnels while I was pouring out my blood for love of country—that is, I was willing to pour, which is the same thing, I take it."

"'Bout the same, Abe," paternally replied the colonel, "except that the bullets don't hit yo'."

"When the wah ended I run for office, same as all the rest. They owed me an office for having laid down my life for my country, but what was my reward? Kurnel Harper, I reckon yo' can remember that I was knocked out—h'isted twenty feet high—snowed under till yo' couldn't see the top of my hat. That's the way Pike county encouraged me to grab hold with both hands and climb to the top!"

"Yes, I remember about that," mused the colonel as he watched a dog rolling over and over in the dusty street.

"Then I turned to law," continued Abe as he hitched his chair over to get a brace for his feet on a post of the veranda. "Kurnel Harper, nobody on the face of this big earth will ever know how I pinched and saved and starved and worked to get that law business down to a fine point. Did anybody encourage me? Not a critter. Not a pesky varmint had a kind word for me. If I'd known yo' during them struggling times yo'd have been the man to open yo'r wallet and hand me out $30 or so and tell me to pay it back in my own good time. Yes, that would have been yo', kurnel."

"Yes, mebbe," doubtfully replied the colonel.

"Waal, I got to be a lawyer. Then what? I wanted practice. I finally got a case and went into court with it, but the pesky jury was lying in ambush to throw me down. Yes, suh—had the purtiest, nicest, cleanest case yo' ever heard tell of, and that jury was bound by law and evidence to bring in a verdict for me, but I got the cold flop instead. They brought my client in guilty of stealing a hawg when he was thirty miles away at the time at the bedside of his dying mother. Do yo' call that encouraging a young man, kurnel? Was that giving me a show to climb up?"

"Can't skassly call it that, Abe, but if I remember right they found fresh pork in yo'r client's house."

"They found meat there, of co'se, but was it the meat of that yere hawg or some other? They never stopped to consider, kurnel—never stopped to consider—but throwed the verdict agin me in order to crush me out. Same way in the second case and the third and fo'th. No matter how many witnesses I had or how plain I made my case, no Pike county jury would find for me. How many times have yo' got to flop a young man, Kurnel Harper, to kill off his ambition and take the fight out of him?"

"'Bout fo' times, I reckon."

"Jest about fo' times, kurnel. After that fo'th flop I realized that Pike county was agin me as a lawyer, and I went into politics. There I was flopped ag'in. I took to the lecture platform, and how many times did I lecture? Jest once, kurnel. Then came the flop. It has been flop, flop, flop right along, no matter what I've turned to, and how much longer do yo' think I can stand it?"

"But yo won't have to go to work, will yo', Abe?" queried the colonel, with a tinge of sarcasm in his voice.

"Never in this world, kurnel; never in this world! That's what Pike county wants to drive me into, but she shall never succeed. I've got ideas, suh; ideas. I've a scheme for putting mo' water in whisky and thus doubling production. I've invented a bar'l with fo' bungholes instead of two. I've got a horseshoe with a spring to it to help start the horse off. I've got a scheme to do away with all doorknobs and save $30,000,000 a year. I've got a scheme to make all forks with two tines only and thus save every household $10 a year. I've got fo'ty different good things to work on, Kurnel Harper, and I'm telling yo' I'll yet see the day I can buy and sell this crowd that's trying to keep me down. I'll do it for shore, kurnel; do it for shore."

"I reckon yo' will, Abe—leastwise I never saw yo' so stirred up befo'. What yo' got in yo'r throat to make yo' gasp and gurgle that way?"

"Can't you understand, kurnel?"

"Not skassly. Haven't swallowed one of these pesky hoss flies, have yo'?"

"No, it's not hoss flies. It's half an hour over my regular time, kurnel, and I've got a thirst to me. No, I don't mind stepping around with yo' for a nip, being yo' are a man who don't like to nip alone and have had the goodness to ask me. Jest lead the way, kurnel, and I'll be along a minute late—same as if I sort of overtook yo' by accident, yo' know." M. QUAD.

For All Possible Emergencies.

"This is glorious!" exclaimed the fair maid as the automobile struck a smooth stretch of country road and the young man let the machine go at full speed. "But who are those two men that have been following us in a runabout all morning?"

"Never mind them," he replied. "One is the repair man and the other's the surgeon."—Chicago Tribune.

White's catch wasn't very heavy;

Thought that I would lose him, though—a rattling fight he made.

ADMIRAL DICK

By BISSELL BRICE

Copyright, 1904, by A. H. Martin

THE battlefield was in a Pennsylvania valley through which the Badger river flowed between the two flanking chains of hills. This valley was a natural highway between two populous sections. On the western bank a railroad had already spun its threads of steel and become one of the best paying lines in the country, the amount of business handled by it having caused the general superintendent to remark, "The B. and R. E. isn't very long, but she's mighty wide."

Two other lines had cast envious glances at the traffic of the B. and R. E. and planned to extend their tracks so as to tap this rich section. This was especially desirable, as it would give them a short cut into Pittsburg.

The western shore being already occupied, each of the new companies had run a survey along the precipitous side of the eastern hills and was rapidly pressing construction work.

"PRICE, I WANT TO DO A BIT OF HUSTLING TOMORROW."

The B. R. had been the first to commence work and had run their grade close to the river and but a few feet above high water mark. The B. F. and N. grade stakes were set about twenty feet higher up. For about half a mile the hillside was almost perpendicular and of solid rock. The B. R. had completed a considerable stretch of their grade when the B. F. and N. began cutting out the hill above them, scattering rocks and consternation among the men below.

The latter road was part of a very wealthy system whose board of directors had determined to use every effort to prevent the B. R. from completing their road. Every step, both in the courts and on the ground, had been hotly contested with the hope of tiring out the B. R., which was much weaker financially and less able to stand the strain of a wasteful struggle.

They hoped to force them into abandoning their claim. Already a number of the members of the B. R. board were in favor of giving up the fight and selling out to their rival, which had offered a sum sufficient to cover the expenses already incurred. The president and a majority of the board had, however, insisted upon standing upon what they knew to be their rights and not surrendering to the unjust domineering of their powerful enemy.

An injunction had been obtained by the B. R. restraining the other road from interfering with them until the matter could be determined in court. They had even agreed to suspend any further work on their own line until such legal decision was rendered. The other company, knowing the weakness of their claim, had refused to do this and had succeeded in having the injunction set aside upon a technical irregularity in the proceedings.

Steps were immediately taken by the B. R. for a rehearing in the matter of the injunction, and it was while this was in course of preparation that the B. F. and N. redoubled their efforts to crush their weaker neighbor.

The last setback had discouraged others of the B. R.'s directors, and it was only by the most strenuous efforts that the president of the company could get them to continue the struggle.

The enmity existing between the two roads had spread to the workmen, who looked upon each other with bitter hatred.

Dick Gallagher's father was foreman of a gang on the B. R. which was working at a point where the battle raged most fiercely. This was a mile or so below Houseton, where the Gallaghers lived. It was a hot July day, and Dick had been kept busy with the water pail. He had just brought a fresh supply and was passing it among the men when his father, who had been keeping a watchful eye on the gang above, called out: "Look out, b'ys! They're sittin' off another blast up thar, th' murtherin' devils. Run!"

The men dropped their tools and hurried down the grade just in time to escape a shower of rocks which came hailing down in torrents.

The men on the upper level laughed to see their undignified flight. Their ridicule exasperated Gallagher's men, and as soon as the stones ceased falling they went back and attacked the foot of the slope of the enemy's grade with fury.

Everybody was out of harm's way before another charge of dynamite heaved its chest and sent a portion of the hill down in fragments.

"Everybody," did I say? No. Dick's dog, a common, homely little black cur, but Dick's only possession and pride, had not understood the warning and stood watching their flight in astonishment. Dick saw it all. He saw the great stone that came hurtling down upon poor Jop's head, crushing the life out of him.

He didn't cry—that is, not there, although there wasn't a thing in all this world that he would have taken in exchange for Jop. He picked up his pail without a word and started for the spring. What if his eyes were red when he returned? He had sworn eternal enmity to the B. F. and N., and that mangy little dead dog cost them their road later.

Four days later Dick was sitting on the bank about a half mile above the scene of Jop's taking off, watching the Badger river.

Who would have thought that the peaceful dreamy little Badger of a week ago could have changed to this coffee colored torrent that was rushing so madly by, carrying logs, rafts, henhouses, sheds, shocks of corn and pumpkins in a bewildering jumble?

It looked like a procession of vegetables taking themselves to market. Dick watched the panorama with boyish interest. It was the annual "fall rise"—the rise which, when the flood began to subside a little, would send the coal fleets scurrying, puffing and snorting down the Ohio.

There had been floods before, but none in the memory of man like this. It was already above high water mark and still rising.

Near where Dick sat a small creek entered the Badger through a deep ravine which cut the hill at that point.

The B. F. and N. were erecting a trestle over this ravine. To the north of it they already had tracks laid and construction trains running, as had also the B. R. The hill there not being so precipitous as it was on the south, there was room for the two by a little crowding.

An engine had just stopped a little above where Dick was sitting, and a short, stocky man stepped from the cab.

"Humph," muttered Dick. "Ther walkin' boss 's come to take a look at their old road."

As the general foreman alighted he called to the foreman of the gang which was at work there, and the two walked down toward the trestle. They stopped just behind a boy who was apparently intent upon throwing stones into the river, oblivious to all else.

"Price," said the new arrival, "I want to do a bit of hustling tomorrow. Rogers says he will have this trestle so we can run trains over it by 9 tonight. Now is our chance to clinch our hold and make the B. R. sick of their job. I want you to get your men out by daylight in the morning and work them to the limit. I am going to run trains over here and dump riprap down on the B. R. I'll make them a present of more ballast than they ever saw. I'll bury them clear out of sight, and there won't be any resurrection for them.

"They have had the advantage of us heretofore because they could run trains in from both ends. Since they got that culvert completed down there they were in a position to couple up their track right off and run trains clear through, if this flood hadn't stopped them. But I wouldn't have had them get a train through for the world."

The general foreman rubbed his fat hands in gleeful anticipation of the things he would do to and the surprises he had in store for the B. R.

The two men walked back over the trestle and on up the track, leaving a small boy throwing stones at a big yellow pumpkin that seemed to be in a great hurry to get somewhere, closely pursued in this commendable effort by an old farmyard gate. They did not know the boy—in fact, gave him no thought. Their minds were full of weightier matters, for were they not fighting a great battle—a battle in which fortunes were at stake?

That was where the construction boss made his mistake, for the spy is often more dangerous than the general, and that small boy was likewise thinking of other things than the pumpkin which seemed to absorb his attention.

Dick was thinking of Jop and the bitter contest waged for so many days between his father's gang and the men in the cut above. He watched the general of the opposing forces disappear into the cab again after the train had been unloaded.

His brain had been in a whirl. What should he do? Their own tracks—his own tracks he almost considered them—were under water here and no trains running. It was already 5 o'clock, and none of the B. R. men about, and construction headquarters were at Barnstable, twenty miles up the road. As he heard the whistle of the engine on the rival company's train calling in their flagman preparatory to starting back a firm resolve took possession of him. He hurried across the trestle and caught the last car just as it was moving off. It was a gondola. He pulled himself over the side and crouched down on the floor out of sight, bound for Barnstable.

The engineer of construction of the B. R. was just leaving his office when he heard some one running down the platform and calling: "Mr. Bent! Mr. Bent!"

He turned about, thrust his hands deep into his pockets and looked from under the peak of his cap to see who was calling.

Dick came up out of breath.

"Well, what is it?" inquired the engineer.

"I—I've got—eh—a somethin' to tell ye," puffed the boy.

"All right. Catch up with your breath as quick as you can and let's have it. But who are you?"

"I'm Dick—Dick Gallagher. I live down at Houseton. My father's foreman at—at the rock cut."

"Oh, Jerry Gallagher's boy, eh? Well, what's up?"

"The B. F. and N. is goin' to run over their trestle tonight and start dumpin' on our tracks. They say they will bury us out of sight by the time the water goes down."

"What!" exclaimed Mr. Bent incredulously, looking intently at Dick. "Who told you?"

Between gasps for breath Dick told his story. The engineer thrust his hands deeper into his pockets. His eyes seemed to retreat under his shaggy brows. His chin was thrust forward, and he bit savagely at his mustache.

"Come with me," he said, leading the way back to the depot and into the telegraph office. The operator had his lunch basket open in front of him and was already about half through with his supper.

"Call up C. D. as quick as you can," said Mr. Bent, taking a chair by the operator's side. "Clickety, click," went the instrument.

"I have him, sir."

"Ask him if the superintendent is in and say I want to talk with him."

After a short pause there came an answering stutter in the receiver.

"He is there now, sir," was the interpretation given by the man at the wire.

Then began an exciting lot of jabber, as though the instrument had gone crazy. After it had continued for about fifteen minutes back and forth Mr. Bent said: "That's all right. Now call up A. Y. and tell John Connolly that I want him to bring his work engine down here with a gondola of stone tonight and to be here at 11. C. D. will notify the dispatcher's office, and his crew will get their orders at A. Y. in time to start."

After this order had gone out and the instrument had again ceased its clatter the engineer said, "Now get Moro and ask how the river is up there."

Again the operator bent over the board, pressing the metal tongue and making it speak. Then, inclining his head and listening, he said, "Water is reported falling four inches an hour."

"Good!" ejaculated Mr. Bent. "Good! Then it must be nearly stationary here. The fall ought to reach here"—placing his hand on his chin and making a mental calculation which required a tense wrinkling of his forehead—"about—let's see—about midnight. Have you had any supper?" addressing Dick.

"No, sir; I just got here when I saw you."

"Well, then, come over to the hotel." And he led Dick across the tracks and into the dining room of the Continental.

True, he looked a little out of place there with his old clay soiled clothes and rumpled hair, but so long as Mr. Bent was his sponsor it was all right.

Shortly after midnight an engine, caboose and a gondola moved out of the station at Barnstable. The gondola was in front and the caboose behind the engine. The caboose was filled with men. In the cab of the locomotive were the engineer and fireman, also two others. On the seat with the engineer was Mr. Dumond, the general superintendent; with the fireman was Mr. Bent.

The special flew through the darkness until that part of the road was reached where the track was lost in the water. Here the pace was slackened to a mere crawl as the heavy monster felt its way over the hidden rails.

The gondola had been heavily loaded with stone and placed ahead so that it could be shoved over the track as a sort of feeler to see whether the road bed had been weakened by the flood or whether it would stand up under the weight of the engine.

The water began to splash and swirl about the wheels. It rose higher and higher. It touched the bottom of the fire box and there was an ominous hiss. On pushed the train, and higher came the water until it was almost up to the cab floor.

"Bent," said the superintendent, "do you think we can make it?"

"I don't know," was the engineer's reply as he peered out into the darkness, trying to get the exact location. "I think we are at about the lowest point now. We run on a level for a short distance here and then strike a 2 per cent grade which will lift us up again."

"What's that?" exclaimed Mr. Dumond, gazing ahead.

"Where?" inquired his companions.

"Out there on the gondola."

The engine man looked over his shoulder. "Looks like a boy," he said.

"Well, I'll be hanged!" was Mr. Bent's comment after drawing in his head. "If that isn't that young rascal, Dick. He's bound to see the thing through sure enough."

And Dick it was, standing in the gondola. He had crouched down among the stone inside and hidden before the start, but now the swishing of the waters had aroused his curiosity, and he was standing erect, peering into the waters ahead like a ship's lookout.

"That boy will make a hustler, all right, if he only has the right sort of training," said Mr. Bent. "Looks like an admiral taking his fleet into action, doesn't he?"

And "Admiral Dick" he was called from that day.

The up grade was soon struck, and by the time the scene of action was reached there were scarcely six inches of water on the rails.

Out of the caboose tumbled the men with heavy iron cables, chains and hooks. They crept cautiously up the bank to the rival road's trestle. The chains and cables were passed around the timbers of that structure and made fast. A great saw was judiciously applied in certain well selected places. The cables were made fast to the drawhead of the engine and the word given.

"Puff! Puff! Puff!" It seemed as if the whole hillside was breathing. The valley echoed with the sound as the monster gasped for breath. The cables swished up out of the water and grew taut. Dick, standing on the upper level at a safe place, watched breathlessly.

There was a sputter and roaring stutter as the driving wheels slipped and went whirring round. Again the steam was let into the cylinders cautiously, again that echoing snort and straining of wires, but this time the drivers took a good grip on the track. There was a cracking sound, then a crash and roar as the structure gave way and went crashing into the ravine.

"I guess there won't be many trains run over that trestle this week," chuckled Mr. Bent as the train swept back toward B.

"It looks to me as if the water was falling, and I'm going to have the rails laid over that culvert and see if we can't get a train through to Pittsburg in the morning, if it's nothing but a switch engine and a flat car."

* * * * * * *

The first faint streak of dawn found Dick still on the spot, anxious to see the downfall of his enemies.

Below him a gang of men were laying the rails over the culvert. The water had receded rapidly, and the entire B. R. line was above water. Off to the north he heard the whistle of the locomotive on the rival road's construction train. It drew into view around the curve, where it was stopped by a flagman. Cautiously it pushed on to the edge of the ravine and stopped again. The superintendent, the foreman of the rock gang and a number of others came and looked down upon the debris of their wrecked trestle.

The superintendent, whose line had been reported short of explosives, seemed to have plenty left in his vocabulary, and he poured forth upon the head of his general foreman a scathing shower of words selected from the muddy end of the dictionary, not exactly complimentary, but expressive of his opinion of that gentleman's failure to have the structure watched.

When the superintendent had gone back up the track his unhappy victim added a few specimens of his own linguistic accomplishments and passed the pleasantries on to the division foreman.

"Hello, you fellers!" shouted Dick. "Why don't you run your train over here and dump them rocks on us? Why don't you bury us out of sight, eh?" Then, addressing the foreman and shaking his dirty little fist at him, "You will kill my dog, will you?"

There was a rumble on the track below, and an engine, southbound, with a passenger coach attached, stopped by the new culvert. The defeated group on the bank above (they were defeated, for the courts decided against them a week later) heard an exasperating laugh and then the voice of Mr. Bent called out: "Ho, there, Dick! You here yet? Come down here. The superintendent wants the admiral to ride into Pittsburg with him. Come on. He wants to introduce you to the board of directors."

THE Japs are clearly averse to any truce with "Adam Zad, the bear that walks like a man."

IF THE colleges keep it up President Roosevelt will have as many degrees as a thermometer.

FOR THE STATE SENATE.

We call attention to the announcement of the candidacy of Mr. W. McCulloh Brown for the office of State Senate.

After graduating from college, some 24 years ago, Mr. Brown came to Garrett county and settling in the woods went to work to clear out a farm, the lumber for building being sawed upon the place. As the farm improved he turned his attention to surveying and engineering, having charge of the survey of our Western Boundary Line in the suit of Maryland against West Virginia. He assisted in the survey of the line between Allegany and Garrett counties and during the summer of 1900 was working in the west for the U. S. Coast and Geodetic Survey.

His family upon his mother's side, were from Baltimore and have been large land owners for upward of 65 years. His father, the late Wm. [illegible] Brown, was a 'Squire in District No. 8.

Mr. Brown is Vice President of the State Horticultural Society from our county; has been active in furthering farmers' institute work, and has thoroughly identified himself with the interests of Garrett, and if elected would earnestly work for the advancement and welfare of the county.

ROADS—MARKS OF CIVILIZATION.

In the United States the best auahorities state that there are 212,000 miles of railroad, whereas, the whole of Europe has only about 190,000. We have, therefore, 22,000 miles more than the most densely settled countries of the civilized world. The reason for this lies in the fact that the United States came into possession of vast tracts of unpeopled land in the west, and there development came after the invention of the locomotive, whereas Europe was all settled before the application of steam power to locomotive. The steam railroad means much more to us than it does to Europeans. The Europeans had a system of roadways by which commerce could be conducted prior to the use of steam power. Our roadways came after steam and so far as they have been developed, have been on the basis of making them feeders to the railways. Roads of all kinds are the great marks of a civilized State and both kinds will continue to be used, as one is a supplement of the other. Maryland must keep well to the front in the national movement for improved highways. Other States are authorizing large expenditures and are getting rich returns on the investment.

Close of the Oakland Normal.

Yesterday at noon the Oakland Normal School closed after a very successful session of ten weeks under the management of Prof. J. Frank McBee, assisted by Mr. A. L. Lee. Prior to the closing of the school Prof. McBee was presented with engrossed resolutions adopted by the school of which the following is a copy and was handed this paper by the committee of scholars having the drafting of the same in charge:

WHEREAS, It has been the pleasure of the trustees of the Oakland school to remove from the principalship of the school Prof. McBee; therefore be it

Resolved, That we, his students, among whom he has labored so faithfully, extended to him our heartfelt thanks for his untiring efforts among us and the assurance that the love and respect of each and every pupil goes with him; and be it further

Resolved, That we after spending a pleasant and profitable term of ten weeks under the matchless leadership of Prof. J. Frank McBee, as a body of students loathe to give him up. His kindness, his professional ability, his up-to-date methods, his frank and manly conduct and his manifested interest in us that we witness the close of this normal term with many sad regrets, but we assure Prof. McBee wherever his field of labor leads him that he has the sympathy and good wishes of Oakland Normal of 1905. Be it

Resolved, That the foregoing be adopted by the Normal and presented to Prof. J. Frank McBee as a memento of our appreciation for his untiring efforts in our behalf

Resolved, That we hereby extend our heartfelt thanks to Prof. A. L. Lee for his faithful and untiring efforts in preparing us for examination and future usefulness, and we assure him that the good will and best wishes of the entire Normal are his.

Bags and bundles of fun at Bitinger on the "Glorious Fourth", a day filled with sociability and real old fashioned enjoyment. Donkey races, ball games, and other sports to interest you and make you laugh. Music by a band from the Keystone state, vocal and instrumental productions that will make your heart ache. Addresses by Hon. Ruckel of Somerset Pa., and others who will be here to entertain you. Don't fail to come over and share these good things with us.

Mr Frederick M. Bittinger of this place, has signified his intention of becoming a candidate for the honors of Sheriff of this county, and is frequently seen button-holeing his friends about town. We hope this his first political venture may not be without merited success.

Squire Wade Hampton Lohr, of Swanton, was seen among his friends here the first of the week.

Messrs. W. A. Althers and Simon Orendorf came over from Pocahontas Pa., last Saturday to spend Sunday with friends here.

Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Brenneman were shopping in Jennings last Monday afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. Elias Orendorf of this place, were visting their sons, Messrs. Daniel and Jonas, who reside near Oakland, Saturday and Sunday.

Mr. Nelson Custer, of McHenry, has been employed by Dennis Deitriech, as mail carrier of this route, and will move his family to this place this week.

Could the members of the Board of County Commissioners hear the many imprecations called forth by the receipt of tax bills within the passed week, they would indeed see the decline of their popularity.

Ancient Wheat Straw.

George Livengood of near Cuzzari, this county, one of the prominent farmers of that section, has about a wagon-load of wheat straw in his barn, cut and bound in sheaves, that has been there over forty-six years. It was grown on the farm and killed by the big frost of June 5, 1850, just when it had headed out, but no grain. The frost killed it and they cut and bound it for feed. It was hauled into the barn and being the first crop of the season was in the bottom of the mow and has been there ever since, and is still in good condition and shows that Mr. Livengood certainly lives good and always has plenty of feed not to have needed that in all these years.—Kingwood Argus.

Many of our people will spend the Fourth out of town. Some will go to Friendsville, others to Accident and some to Confluence.

WASHINGTON NEWS NOTES.

Capital City Will Entertain Many Notables at the Peace Conference.

Washington has been chosen as the meeting place of the Russian and Japanese plenipotentiaries and if, as the President confidently believes they will, they negotiate a convention providing for a lasting peace in the far East it will be known as the treaty of Washington, taking its place in history with those international conventions known as "the Treaty of Ghent," the "Treaty of Berlin," the "Treaty of Paris" and many others.

The selection of Washington as the meeting place of the commissioners of the belligerents was the natural outcome of the difference which had developed between the two nations. Japan steadfastly declined to send representative to any meeting place in Europe, other than London, fearing that they would be more or less hostile sentiment with which they would be surrounded in Paris, Geneva and perhaps even at the Hague. Russia was on the other hand, entirely opposed to a meeting in Asia, and the United States seemed the natural ground of compromise, being too, more nearly half way between the two nations than any other country suggested. President Roosevelt, although he had personally favored the Hague, was not loath to have the conference held here for it must emphasize the diplomatic importance of the capital of "the new world."

It is authoritively stated that if the climate in Washington proves too warm for the comfort of the plenipotentiaries every facility will be afforded them to meet elsewhere for a time. That is, they may meet and organize in Washington, then adjourn to some northern summer resort and return to the national capital for their closing sessions. If the commissioners determine to adjourn to some cooler point the President will place at their disposal two small naval vessels, presumably the Sylph and the Dolphin. He will himself return from Oyster Bay to welcome them to America but expects to remain but a short time, after which he will again retire to his summer home.

With the question of a place of meeting disposed of the President and the diplomatic representative of the belligerents have now turned their attention to the question of the date for convening the conference and an announcement on this subject may be looked for daily. It is recalled that when commissioners from the United States and Spain met in Paris it required from October 1 to December 10 to complete their work, although the problems which confronted them were simple by comparison with those which will confront the Russian and Japanese diplomats.

The President has taken a step which does not meet with the entire approval of some members of his cabinet but which is likely to be commended by the public at large. He has appointed a committee consisting of his most trusted friends in the government service and placed Charles H. Keep, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, at its head. To this committee he has confided the duty of making a thorough investigation of the business methods of every executive department in Washington with two purposes in view, first to ascertain if lax methods of handling finances exist and if so to make recommendations for their remedy, second, to discover, if possible, what, if any methods can be adopted to contribute to economical administration. Such over hauling of their affairs is not generally welcomed by the heads of the various departments but the President believes that the Postoffice scandals, which grew out of lax methods in the Postoffice Department, the recent defalcation in the Smithsonian Institute, the recent manifest maladministration in the General Land Office, etc., amply warrant a thorough probing of all executive methods with a special view to preventing further misappropriations of the government's fund, lands and privileges.

In the direction of economy the investigators are certain to find themselves confronted by numerous instances where material economy of administration would be effected could Congress be induced to adopt rational and business like methods in place of the irrational except from a "spoils" standpoint now in vogue. For instance under the existing statutes each executive department is compelled to compile, at great expense for compilation and printing, a complete statement of every item expended throughout the year. Nor is this all, for members of Congress, fearful that one will secure something that the other does not, insist that several hundred copies of these be printed for each and every Senator and Representative. Of course they are of no possible use to the members of Congress except to make something to frank to their constituent as an evidence that the beloved constituents is not forgotten. The reports are of no use to the constituents either except, possibly as a shaving paper or to light their fires.

As a matter of fact there is no good reason why these elaborate and detailed compilations of innumerable petty expenditures should be compiled at all. They are all a matter of record in the Treasury Department and no one ever reads the reports themselves. No business house regards it as necessary to print a transcript of its entire expenditures for the year which can be ascertained by consulting the proper books and no one has thus far advanced any good reason for the government's doing so. The extravagent waste of money, resulting from provisions inserted by Congress in every bill authorizing a government publicatian, that each and every member of Congress shall have from 50 to 100 copies, absolutely irrespective of the appropriateness of the publication for general distribution is enormous.

ASHBY—TERRY—The marriage of Miss Gertrude E. Terry and Mr. Joseph Ashby of Crellin Md., took place Tuesday evening, June 13, 1905, at 8 p. m., at the bride's home, Lincoln flats. Rev. Nicholson officiated. The ceremony was sweet in its simplicity. No invitations were issued, the guests being limited to the members of the families of the bridal pair. The bride, who is an attractive brunette, was attired in gown of white organdy and lace and carried a shower bouquet of white carnations tied with flowing ends and loops of white gauze ribbon. Mrs. R. L. Bradfield, sister of the bride, acted as matron of honor, and Mr. Frederick Hodge was best man. The couple entered the parlor to the strains of Lohengrin, rendered by Miss Leitha Hane. After the ceremony the wedding party repaired to the dining room, where a collation was served.—Washington Star.

WASHINGTON NEWS NOTES.

Capital City Will Entertain Many Notables at the Peace Conference.

Washington has been chosen as the meeting place of the Russian and Japanese plenipotentiaries and if, as the President confidently believes they will, they negotiate a convention providing for a lasting peace in the far East it will be known as the treaty of Washington, taking its place in history with those international conventions known as "the Treaty of Ghent," the "Treaty of Berlin," the "Treaty of Paris" and many others.

The selection of Washington as the meeting place of the commissioners of the belligerents was the natural outcome of the difference which had developed between the two nations. Japan steadfastly declined to send representative to any meeting place in Europe, other than London, fearing that they would be more or less hostile sentiment with which they would be surrounded in Paris, Geneva and perhaps even at the Hague. Russia was on the other hand, entirely opposed to a meeting in Asia, and the United States seemed the natural ground of compromise, being too, more nearly half way between the two nations than any other country suggested. President Roosevelt, although he had personally favored the Hague, was not loath to have the conference held here for it must emphasize the diplomatic importance of the capital of "the new world."

It is authoritively stated that if the climate in Washington proves too warm for the comfort of the plenipotentiaries every facility will be afforded them to meet elsewhere for a time. That is, they may meet and organize in Washington, then adjourn to some northern summer resort and return to the national capital for their closing sessions. If the commissioners determine to adjourn to some cooler point the President will place at their disposal two small naval vessels, presumably the Sylph and the Dolphin. He will himself return from Oyster Bay to welcome them to America but expects to remain but a short time, after which he will again retire to his summer home.

With the question of a place of meeting disposed of the President and the diplomatic representative of the belligerents have now turned their attention to the question of the date for convening the conference and an announcement on this subject may be looked for daily. It is recalled that when commissioners from the United States and Spain met in Paris it required from October 1 to December 10 to complete their work, although the problems which confronted them were simple by comparison with those which will confront the Russian and Japanese dipiomats.

The President has taken a step which does not meet with the entire approval of some members of his cabinet but which is likely to be commended by the public at large. He has appointed a committee consisting of his most trusted friends in the government serviee and placed Charles H. Keep, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, at its head. To this committee he has confided the duty of making a thorough investigation of the business methods of every executive department in Washington with two purposes in view, first to ascertain if lax methods of handling finances exist and if so to make recommendations for their remedy, second, to discover, if possible, what, if any methods can be adopted to contribute to economical administration. Such over hauling of their affairs is not generally welcomed by the heads of the various departments but the President believes that the Postoffice scandals, which grew out of lax methods in the Postoffice Department, the recent defalcation in the Smithsonian Institute, the recent manifest maladministration in the General Land Office, etc., amply warrant a thorough probing of all executive methods with a special view to preventing further misappropriations of the government's fund, lands and privileges.

In the direction of economy the investigators are certain to find themselves confronted by numerous instances where material economy of administration would be effected could Congress be induced to adopt rational and business like methods in place of the irrational except from a "spoils" standpoint now in vogue. For instance under the existing statutes each executive department is compelled to compile, at great expense for compilation and printing, a complete statement of every item expended throughout the year. Nor is this all, for members of Congress, fearful that one will secure something that the other does not, insist that several hundred copies of these be printed for each and every Senator and Representative. Of course they are of no possible use to the members of Congress except to make something to frank to their constituent as an evidence that the beloved constituents is not forgotten. The reports are of no use to the constituents either except, possibly as a shaving paper or to light their fires.

As a matter of fact there is no good reason why these elaborate and detailed compilations of innumerable petty expenditures should be compiled at all. They are all a matter of record in the Treasury Department and no one ever reads the reports themselves. No business house regards it as necessary to print a transcript of its entire expenditures for the year which can be ascertained by consulting the proper books and no one has thus far advanced any good reason for the government's doing so. The extravagant waste of money, resulting from provisions inserted by Congress in every bill authorizing a government publicatian, that each and every member of Congress shall have from 50 to 100 copies, absolutely irrespective of the appropriateness of the publication for general distribution is enormous.

3,000,000 American Flags Annually

Patriotism has become the basis of a great American industry. Because of the amazing increase of patriotic sentiment in this country during the last decade the manufacture of American flags has quadrupled. More than three million Star Spangled Banners annually are made of silk and bunting, but these form only a small portion of the total number of United States flags that are born, that live and die between January and January.

In remote farming districts where ten years ago the national colors were rarely seen every suitable occasion witnesses a flag display. The flag has been added to the household gods from Maine to California and from the Gulf of Mexico to the Canadian line.

WILD TURKEY EGGS

Wanted by Secretary of W. Va. Board of Agriculture for Breeding Purposes.

Secretary J. O. Thompson, of the W. Va. board of agriculture, has been trying for some time to get some wild turkey eggs for the Rhode Island experiment station. In a recent interview on the subject he said:

"These eggs are wanted for the purpose of crossing with the breeds of turkeys in Rhode Island and the eastern states. The turkey raisers in that section of the country find it necessary to run in a brood to breed out disease or the turkey family will soon disappear from the face of the earth. The turkeys in that country, where heretofore the finest turkeys have been raised, are fast running out and it is estimated that in a few years at the prevailing rate, they will totally disappear, unless a strain of wild brood can be obtained and bred into them. This great decrease in the number is due to inbreeding."

Many Visitors at Deer Park.

Deer Park Hotel opned auspiciously on Saturday last with a full complement of guests. The hotel had really been open to the public from the middle of June, consequent upon demands on Manager Burwell for accommodation. Five pages of the register were required to record the names of the officials attending the Baltimore and Ohio conference, and complimentry remarks were made on the improved condition of the hotel and grounds.

The Deer Park water is a feature calling for special commendation. It is piped to the hotel from the famous Boling Springs, three miles distant.

General Manager Thomas Fitzgerad, Mrs. Fitzgerald and Miss Pearl Robinson, of Baltimore; General Superintendent C. C. F. Bent and Assistant General Manager L. G. Haas and Mrs. Haas were Sunday visitors.

Grange Meeting.

A meeting of Garrett Pomona Grange was held Saturday, June 24th, with the Oak Grove Grange. The weather was such as to try the "pluck" of the Garrett Grangers, but many came from a distance to hear the highly appreciated addresses of Prof. Hutt, the State Horticulturalist, and Prof. Morton, the state Pathologist, of College Park, Md.

It is a great treat to get these men here from the college to enlighten our farmers along their lines of work.

The Pomona Grange will meet again July 24th at Painter schoolhouse near Swanton. Prof. Mortimer Whitehead, one of the best orators of the National Grange, will address the meeting there.

Grangers should make a general rally and come out to hear him.

An Awful Prospect.

Concentrated foods—turkey dinners which are compressed within the limits of a capsule and three-course luncheons comprised within a globule the size of a quinine pill—have had their day of exploitation and failed to fascinate the hungry. But now comes a Wisconsin chemist with a proposition which, by appealing to man's natural depravity, may stand a chance of achieving a greater popularity than fell to the lot of concentrated foods. This inciter of evil offers to mankind vest-pocket jags and half ounce saturnalias in the form of a concentrated extract of hops, malt and fermentation-producing material which is 11,000 times stronger than ordinary beer. One drop of it in water produces a glass of the finest lager and an ounce vial of the extract, easily carried in the vest pocket is equal to 30 gallons of beer, he says. This is a decided blow to the growler trade, and when the discovery is viewed with regard to the traveling public, it opens up a vista of hideous possibilities at which the imagination shudders. Clearly the W. C. T. U. should forget the army canteen for a while and get after the Wisconsin chemist.

The Mother's Responsibility—And the Father's

By MAY WRIGHT SEWALL, Author and Lecturer

I BELIEVE that there is a great menace to the family, and consequently to the state, indicated by certain tendencies of opinion and life. Chief among these I consider the tendency to magnify the responsibility of WOMEN and IGNORE the responsibility of men. The birth of a child implies two parents. From my point of view it is entirely impossible to exaggerate the necessity for purity, devotion and responsibility which should be required of mothers.

MY PLEA IS THAT SOCIETY SHALL BE TRAINED TO DEMAND NOT LESS OF PURITY, DEVOTION AND SENSE OF RESPONSIBILITY IN FATHERS.

I believe that there are dangers of race degeneration, if not immediate danger of race extinction. There is no doubt that one of these dangers proceeds from the selfishness, the love of ease and the personal vanity of women, who from these causes are moved to escape what they consider the BURDENS of maternity.

These conditions cannot be too seriously deprecated nor too severely reprimanded by any one, but this evasion by married women of the maternity, which is the crown of the wife, is but one cause of the existing menace to family life.

MEN ARE NOT LESS SELFISH nor less ease loving nor less desirous of seeking material comfort and physical luxury at the expense of the sacrifice of children than our women.

It is ridiculous to talk as if women were the sole party to the postponement of marriage in a state of society which does not permit women to propose marriage.

Men postpone marriage and move from or never secure simple individual homes that they may be spared the responsibility of keeping an individual furnace running and that they may escape other small duties which fall to the lot of the average independent householder, and they do this because they love ease, comfort and luxury more than the chaste pleasures of family life, ACCOMPANIED BY ITS RESPONSIBILITIES.

I personally know scores of young women in all respectable stations of life, from the industrious, well paid clerk, stenographer and reporter, through all classes of teachers, through all classes of the daughters of men, from well to do to opulent, whose hearts yearn for an opportunity to live an independent family life, for a chance to help to found a home and produce children.

Of these the working portion would gladly give up the independence of a personal wage and salary and do, instead of the work which now occupies them, the housework IN THEIR OWN HOMES if young men of equal purity of personal life and equally fine domestic and moral feelings should give them a chance to help to build a pure home and produce pure, untainted children.

The young women of the second class referred to, daughters of homes of comfort and luxury, would leave their present round of afternoon teas and evening receptions and go from their present luxurious environment under their parents' roofs with joy for the chance to carry out their own ideals and their own purposes in founding a simple home with some young man of their own class equally willing to give up his bachelor luxuries for the most dignified estate of husbandhood and paternity.

What I deprecate is talking about the production and nurture of children AS IF WOMEN HAD SOLE RESPONSIBILITY concerning them. I realize that in the nature of the case the mother has not only the stronger prenatal influence over the child, but also the greater influence during its first years.

I consider it a blot upon civilization that the educational systems of a country which, like ours, boasts of its intelligence and culture, takes no account of the functions of wifehood and motherhood in the education of its girls.

Notwithstanding this defect in the education of girls, generally speaking they are MUCH BETTER PREPARED IN BODY AND MIND for their duties as wives and mothers than young men are for their duties as husbands and fathers.

Let us by all means multiply our mothers' clubs and increase the number and influence of our mothers' congresses, but let us at the same time do something to turn the thoughts of men, young and old, to those duties and those responsibilities toward children already here and those yet unborn, WHICH CANNOT POSSIBLY BE SHIRKED and thrown upon the shoulders of women.

LET FATHERS IN THEIR HOMES AND MEN TEACHERS IN THEIR SCHOOLS AND RABBIS AND PRIESTS AND CLERGYMEN IN THEIR PULPITS AND THE PRESS EVERYWHERE GIVE A LITTLE ATTENTION TO THE PHYSICAL HABITS AND CONSEQUENT PHYSICAL CONDITION AND TO THE MORAL IDEALS OF MEN.

A Poem for Today

THE LAND OF STORY BOOKS

By Robert Louis Stevenson

AT evening, when the lamp is lit,
Around the fire my parents sit;
They sit at home, and talk and sing,
And do not play at anything.

Now, with my little gun, I crawl
All in the dark along the wall,
And follow round the forest track
Away behind the sofa back.

There, in the night, where none can spy,
All in my hunter's camp I lie,
And play at books that I have read
Till it is time to go to bed.

These are the hills, these are the woods,
These are my starry solitudes,
And there the river, by whose brink
The roaring lions come to drink.

I see the others far away,
As if in fire lit camp they lay,
And I, like to an Indian scout,
Around their party prowled about.

So, when my nurse comes in for me,
Home I return across the sea,
And go to bed with backward looks
At my dear Land of Story Books.

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

April 9, 1865

[Copyright, 1905, by G. L. Kilmer.]

LEE'S army was surrounded at Appomattox on the morning of April 9, 1865, but its lion hearted commander refused to yield until convinced that the situation was hopeless. Several letters had passed between Lee and Grant during the previous twenty-four hours with reference to surrender. Grant asked the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia to avoid "further effusion of blood." Lee offered to treat for peace.

The Confederates were hemmed in as the lines stood, but there had been doubt in the minds of Lee and his officers the night of April 8 as to whether the Army of the Potomac was all on the field. It was decided at a council of war that General John B. Gordon and General Fitz Lee should attempt to hew a path through Sheridan's ranks on the west and lead the march to Lynchburg.

Robert E. Lee in person repaired to the picket line the morning of the 9th, hoping to meet Grant there for a conference under a flag of truce. He found awaiting him a note from Grant stating definitely that he (Grant) would not treat for peace. Grant at the moment was eight miles distant, and Lee, having learned meanwhile that Gordon and Fitz Lee reported strong columns of Federal infantry on their front as well as Sheridan's cavalry, wrote asking for an interview with Grant to discuss terms of surrender.

The generals met about 1 o'clock at the house of Wilmer McLean, in the village of Appomattox, and the details for the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia were arranged. The terms were parole of officers and men, with the privilege of going home. The private property of officers paroled was not to be disturbed, and soldiers who claimed horses were allowed to keep them. "They will need them to do their spring plowing," said Grant. The surrender embraced about 28,000 men, but only about 8,000 delivered up muskets. Fitz Lee withdrew his cavalry before the surrender and reached Lynchburg.

The historic Sunday, April 9, 1865, closed with a friendly meeting between the officers and soldiers who had fought one another so zealously for four years. The Federals shared their rations with the southerners, who at times upon this last march had lived upon raw corn.

On the 10th Lee made a farewell address and started for Richmond. Grant set out for Washington the same day to see the president, who had reached there the day before, having left Richmond on the 6th.

On receiving the news of the surrender of Lee, Jefferson Davis abandoned Danville, the new capital of the Confederacy, and started south under a light escort with considerable treasure in specie. He was captured at Irwinsville, Ga., May 10 and imprisoned at Fortress Monroe. The very last hope of the Confederates, the army under General Joseph E. Johnston, confronting Sherman in North Carolina, surrendered April 26. Other surrenders followed, the last of importance being that of the transmississippi forces May 20. In all 175,000 Confederates were released on parole.

While the surrender of Lee, virtually the end of the war, was hailed with the wildest rejoicing all over the north, there was no unusual demonstration among the victorious troops. General Longstreet said that Grant refused to allow an artillery salute to signalize the event. Lee's surrender had long been expected as a result of the Petersburg campaign and was a foregone conclusion after the fall of the city. And yet it took many days for the soldiers to realize that all was over. Grant's troops remained in their old camps around Appomattox, maintaining the usual discipline, with outposts guarding against possible forays by partisan bands.

News of the assassination of Lincoln cast a pall over the army. No one would believe it until it was confirmed. It has been stated that in after years, even in old age, adults of that period remembered distinctly the time of day, the spot where they were, their companions and what they were doing when that awful shock came.

Disbandment of government forces began April 29, detached parties, railway and rendezvous guards being mustered out first. The troops around Appomattox marched to the seaports and were transported by water to Washington. Sherman's army marched from Goldsboro, N. C., to the banks of the Potomac by way of Richmond, Fredericksburg and Manassas. A grand review took place on May 23 and 24, the armies parading on Pennsylvania avenue, where they were reviewed by the commanding generals, President Johnson and his cabinet. [It was on this occasion that Sherman publicly snubbed the secretary of war by refusing to take his proffered hand when greetings were exchanged by the officials at the close of the review.]

Meanwhile the Confederates were walking home all over the south and along the border. Thousands of them didn't tarry for the formality of giving the parole and thousands hid their muskets for future recovery and, when lucky enough to dodge Federal camps en route, took the weapons home. Lee's men were "shy" 20,000 rifles. One incident at Appomattox showed the temper of some "Johnnies" about giving up their guns. Two or three days after the surrender the Federal guard of a farmhouse just outside of Grant's lines saw three Confederates approaching the house, all having their muskets slung across the shoulder by the strap. Two of the party were supporting a third, who could barely walk. The Federals advanced and demanded the surrender of the guns. Two handed them over, but the third, the sick man—he was a boy in his teens—refused and prepared to unsling it for defense. The Federals saw that he was half crazed with sickness and excitement and were lenient. The poor boy in his delirium raged violently and had to be placed on the ground, where he raved on and struggled, trying to draw his gun on the foe. An aged woman tottered forward from the house down the path and recognized the lad as a grandson whose home was in North Carolina. He soon became quiet and died there on the sward after pleading with his last breath, "Tell mother her boy never surrendered." In death his arms were folded across the musket, which lay upon his breast.

The assassination of Lincoln sent the straggling Confederates into hiding for fear of reprisals, although among the Federals there was no disposition to hold the fighting men of the south responsible for that or any other irregular method of warfare. The Confederates were too much rejoiced over peace and the prospect of rejoining their families to indulge in resentment for honorable defeat. They went to work at plowing, as Grant knew they would, inspired by the example of men like Forrest in Tennessee and Major General William Mahone of Virginia, the latter actually bearing a hand in the cornfield himself.

The soldiers of the north, too—and there were a round million of them in arms April 9, 1865—had but one thought, or possibly two—first, to get home somehow quick, and to get there if possible in civilian "togs." The lightning changes of costume made the instant Uncle Sam's mustering out officers had called a soldier's name the last time would have put some of the latter day stage artists to shame. Men had new suits in their knapsacks, in the hands of waiting lackeys or comrades who had got "through" first, stowed in anterooms, in cabs outside, in saloons around the corner. Clothing stores were mobbed by veterans with their hands stuffed with greenbacks. Price and fit were of no account. Then, ho, for the photographer's to get counterfeit presentments to send to distant sweethearts and friends. Cast-off uniforms went to the attic or museum of relics. As a rule, regiments were ordered to their state rendezvous for discharge, and the work was done in vacant halls and old recruit barracks. There were no loving goodbys, either, to the barracks when a veteran shook the dust from his feet to go home—home! The war department during the months of May, June and July forty years ago was bombarded with applications, backed by every sort of "pull," from regiments asking immediate muster out. The veteran who wasn't eager to hurry home and be there for the "glorious Fourth" forgot his peculiarity very quickly and has never cared to recall it. To get home, to get to work, to get back to school, was in the air.

OLD FOES FRATERNIZING AT APPOMATTOX.

Thrifty and long headed veterans had bought farms or shops or stores by mail, hired out or formed partnerships by mail. Thousands of seminary boys had carried text books in their knapsacks and for months had been brushing up for college. The war was over. Now for business. That is why and that is how an army of a million melted in a day and a million pairs of hands inured to every toil took up the implements of peace. Appomattox was great. The sequel was the grandest of all—peace that never has shown the blush of regret over what it stood for.

The aggregate of Federal enlistments was 2,778,304, representing with re-enlistments about 2,250,000 individuals. The Confederate total was about 1,000,000. The aggregate of deaths from all causes in the Federal army was 359,528, and 110,070 soldiers died in battle. The Confederate loss is unknown.

If you own a railroad in Annapolis, you'd better chain it. Somebody on the staff of the Annapolis Capital is getting desperate: "Some people think there are degrees in crime and there are shades in stealing. We often find ourselves telling people to choose between two evils. We find it hard to refrain from saying to a man who just will steal: 'Don't steal a rooster, steal a railroad; don't steal a peice of bacon, steal a bank.' By stealing chickens and bacon a man damages his reputation; by stealing railroads and banks and heaps of funds he enhances his character, and becomes a pampered, honored hero."

END COMES QUICKLY TO A BUSY LIFE.

Secretary of State Hay Died Suddenly Shortly After Midnight.

PHYSICIANS WERE AT HIS BEDSIDE

Patient Had Passed Comfortable Day and Was Looking Forward to Leaving Bed Soon—Attack Came Atfer Bidding Family Good Night.

NEWBURY, N. H., July 1.—Secretary of State John Hay died at 12.25 this morning. The signs immediately preceding his death were those of pulmonary embodism. Mr. Hay's condition during all of Friday had been entirely satisfactory.

The bulletin of Secretary Hay's death was signed by Charles L. Scudder, M. D., and Fred T. Murphy, M. D.

Mrs. Hay and Drs. Scudder and Murphy were at the secretary's bedside when the end came. The secretary bade good night to his wife and to his attending physicians about 10 o'clock last night at the close of one the best days he has had since his illness. The local trouble was clearing up satisfactorily, according to Dr. Scudder.

The secretary suffered none of the old pains in his chest, which characterized his earlier illness. He had been perfectly comfortable all day and happy in the anticipation of leaving his bed for the greater freedom and comfort of a couch.

At 11 o'clock he was sleeping quietly. A few moments after 12 he called the nurse, who at once summoned Dr. Scudder. Both Dr. Scudder and Dr. Murphy hastened to the bedside. The secretary was breathing with difficulty and expired almost immediately afterward at 12.25.

EPWORTH LEAGUE CONVENTION

Report of the Gathering at Mountain Lake Park Last Week.

It is very encouraging to Epworth League workers throughout Oakland District to know that one of the best and most interesting conventions ever held in the district was that at Mt. Lake Park June 27th and 28th, 1605.

On Tuesday evening, June 27th, the meeting began with devotional services with Rev. J. E. Weigle as leader, which were helpful and uplifting to all present.

Immediately following this Rev. P. W. Metheny gave an address of welcome in behalf of the Mt. Lake League and church, which made us all feel welcome indeed. Rev. R. O. Philipps gave an inspiring response in behalf of the delegates. The remainder of the evening session was taken up by Mt. Lake Park E. L. Chapter, who gave us a most excellent literary program well rendered and highly appreciated by the convention.

On Wednesday morning at 6 o'clock a sunrise prayer meeting was conducted by Rev. W. M. Lister. This was well attended and very beneficial.

At 9 o'clock the devotional services consisting of singing, prayer and scripture reading was led by Wm. E. Bishoff.

After the appointment of several committees, Rev. J. B. Workman, district president, gave his second annual report, which was encouraging and contained the following recommendations:

1. That the pastors renew their diligence and push forward the work of the League in their charges, and especially that they be persistent in their efforts to secure reports from each chapter to the District Convention.

2. That the district secretary and president be notified at each election of local officers of the names of president and secretary that they may be able to furnish the information which is so frequently asked for by the Conference and General League officers.

Then followed the paper by Rev. F. M. Cain on the subject, "Success or Failure of the League." This paper contained most excellent thoughts, and the discussion which followed was enthusiastic.

Rev. C. J. Price then preached a sermon, which all were delighted to hear.

The afternoon session of June 28th was begun with devotional services conducted by Rev. H. Scott, which were very beneficial.

Miss Mollie Hamill presented a paper on the subject, "What Should be Taught in the Junior League," which was interesting and helpful to all Junior League workers. Dr. R. B. Ward gave a brief but stirring talk supplementing this and referring to the possibilities of the Junior League.

An important feature of the day was Junior League exercises given by the Junior League of Oakland under the training of Miss Grace Loar. The little folks did their work so well and so faithfully that all were agreeably surprised.

Officers were elected for Oakland District for the coming year as follow:

President, Rev. J. B. Workman, Oakland; 1st V. P., R. A. Smith, Blaine, W. Va.; 2nd V. P., Rev. Daniel Westfall, Thomas, W. Va.; 3rd V. P., Mrs. R. B. Ward, Oakland; 4th V. P., Rev. P. W. Merheny, Mt. Lake Park; Statistical Secretary, Rev. A. L. Ireland, Parsons, W. Va.; Recording Sec., Wm. E. Bishoff, Hoyes; Treasurer, Miss Ora Newman, Independence, W. Va.; Supt. Junior League, Miss Grace Loar, Oakland; Board of Control: Rev. R. O. Philipps, Blaine, W. Va., Rev. J. E. Weigle, Cranesville, W. Va., Rev. J. H. Funk, Horton, W. Va., Rev. F. M. Cain, Rowlesburg, W. Va.

In the evening session the speaker of the evening was Rev. A. L. Ireland, who addressed the convention discussing the "Possibility of the Epworth League." This was an excellent address, and rounded up well the work of the convention.

The attendance was good at all sessions and a lively interest was manifested by the members of the local chapter as well as by the delegates from other chapters.

The next District Convention will be held at Blaine, W. Va.

WM. E. BISHOFF, Secretary.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mrs. Price, wife of Rev. Joseph Price, of Swanton, spent a few days of last week in this place, visiting her son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Price.

Mr. James Beard, a well known citizen of this place, is visiting relatives at Cherry Run. He will not return home until after the Fourth.

Mr. Russel Pattison, the batting pitcher, who has achieved considerable newspaper notoriety on account of his action in compelling the management of the Cumberland baseball club to pay him his salary, for the time he lost, while suffering from injuries received in the line of duty, arrived home on Friday. Russell looks well and seems none the worse from the wear and tear of his scrap with Messrs. Tate, Young & Co. His host of friends and the baseball fans at this end of the league circuit justify him in his action, but have no boquets for Harry Tate.

Mrs. Maggie Collins and her two children, Lloyd and Margarite, spent a few days of last week with relatives in Cumberland.

The reunion and picnic of the Kight family, with, almost a little army of connections, sisters, cousins and aunts, was held in Borderside Grove, at this place, on July 4th. The pioneer settlers of this end of the State belonged to the family and the younger members of the race point with pride to the fact that they had relatives in every war marked down in the history of this country.

Misses Elizabeth and Elsie Hoffman, of Keyser, daughters of Dr. Hoffman, surgeon in chief to the Keyser hospital, were guests of friends last week.

Miss Gloss, a member of a well known English family living in Gobbler's Nob, while sitting with a number of girl companions on the edge of a cliff overlooking the town of Savage a few evenings ago, lost her balance, fell over the precipice, a distance of about 18 feet. Fortunately the undergrowth at the foot of the cliff was very dense and broke the fall and outside of a few bruises and scratches no other injury was sustained.

Messrs. E. J. Hoffman, telegraph operator at the Junction office and William Mickey, of Savage, engineer on the W. Va. C., were in town Sunday.

Fears are expressed by the farmers in this vicinity that the heavy almost constant rains for the past ten days will seriously interfere with the potato crop, peas, beans, potatoes and cabbage, home grown, have been in market for the past two weeks, something unusual for this section.

Mr. William Oss, of the well known lumber of Oss Bros., operating on Savage river, a few miles west of this place, was in town.

"Big Jim" Cross has about exhausted all his patience, lost considerable money and spent lots of time in getting his bangers in such a shape, that their playing would reflect credit on himself as a baseball manager and magnate. They say that when the Lonaconing team presented him with a large white goose egg on the occasion of his twilight visit to that town, the hot air that escaped from "Jim's" respiratory apparatus would have set a whole town afire.

THE FOURTH OF JULY IN OAKLAND

The Crowd Was Well Behaved and Bent on Having a Good Time.

EXPLOSIONS WERE INCESSANT

From Daylight Until Well Into the Knight—Street Parade Was a Frost In One Respect, in Another a Disgrace to Morality.

The Fourth of July this year as celebrated in Oakland was not dissimilar to other celebrations of like character except in one respect, that being the disgraceful and shameful exhibition made by some drunken louts loaded in two wagons representing Hesen's dive on Green street where white and black congregate to drink noxious compounds that fire the brain and turn men into brutes. The two wagons were a portion of the parade to represent the business interests of the town, and it has been well said that the representation as given in the vehicles were true to life of the actions and men who make the saloon their place of rendezvous. Saloons run upon the same principles of this one is what brings bad odor upon the more respectable places thus putting them all in the same class. If there is no law to close this dive and all others of its class there is crying need for one and may God speed the day when Oakland is well rid of them.

In making this comment we believe that we voice the sentiment of all classes including the saloon keepers who aim to keep within the law and to operate their places in a quiet, orderly manner.

The committee having in charge the arrangements for the parade was unaware of the presence of the disreputable spectacle until after the parade had started and was well through the center of the town.

The crowd present on the day was a well behaved one, bent on having a good time and they had it. No arrests were made during the day or evening as no breach of the peace took place that came under the eye of the officers.

The explosion of fireworks begun early in the morning and was continued well up until midnight.

The day was enlivened with music furnished by three bands, the W. O. W. band from Grafton, under the direction of Leo Rasche, the Moscow band and the Keyser band. At the picnic grounds a stand had been erected for dancing, but rain interferred greatly in the afternoon and evening with this pleasure.

THE CAMP MEETING.

Still in Progress at Mountain Lake Park Attended by Large Crowds.

The camp meeting at Mountain Lake Park which begun on last Saturday night is still in progress with interest and religious zeal at a high mark.

During the past few days of the meeting quite a large number have professed conversion and the number of seekers after a changed life are being augmented at every gathering during the day and evening.

Sunday morning Bishop Wilson, of the Methodist Episcopal church, preached to a large congregation and in the afternoon Dr. Peterkin, of New York City made an eloquent appeal to his hearers.

Interest in the meeting will centre about the meetings scheduled for Sunday and Monday. Sunday morning Rev. Joseph Smith will deliver the sermon and in the evening another preacher of ability will occupy the pulpit.

At the Sunday meeting large crowds of people from all parts of the county and adjoining towns of West Virginia are expected to be present.

Women's Home Missionary Society.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Home Missionary Society will be held at Mountain Lake Park July 22, 23, and 24. On Sunday, the 22rd, Rev. C. W. Smith, D. D., editor of the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, will preach at 10.30 o'clock in the morning and at 7.30 in the evening. Miss Ida E. Miner, of Washington, D. C. will give an address.

The annual reception will be held at the Thompson Rest Home on Monday, the 24th inst. from two until five o'clock p. m.

YOUNG MAN KILLED.

By a Runaway Car on Tram Road near Friendsville.

On Monday of this week Charles C. Umbel, of Friendsville, in charge of a light engine on the Bear Creek Lumber Company's narrow gauge tramroad, was so badly injured in a collission between a runaway car and his engine, near Friendsville, that he died a few hours afterward at the Connellsville Hospital, where he was taken after the accident.

Umbel's engine was going up the mountain when a heavy loaded car broke loose on a branch road about a mile above and dashed down the steep grade into the engine. Umbel's skull was fractured and he was injured internally.

BISHOP CONRAD G. LINT.

Some Information Concerning a Well Known German Baptist Minister.

The following interesting mention of Bishop Conrad G. Lint, of Meyersdale, appeared in Monday's Pittsburg Times:

Yesterday Bishop Conrad G. Lint celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his elevation to the ministry, having for that length of time presided over the local congregation of German Baptist Brethren, commonly known as Dunkards. Bishop Lint was born in Meyers Mills (now Meyersdale), April, 1834, and during that time has continously resided here. In 1855, June 16, he was admitted as a member of the church by baptism; the same day he was elected to the office of deacon, and eight days later was elevated to the ministry, having since had charge of the church at this place.

Early in life the bishop entered the blacksmith shop of his father and learned the trade, becoming an expert mechanic. He is a forceful and convincing speaking. In matters pertaining to vocal music he is an authority, inheriting his talent, perhaps, from his ancestors, of Swiss origin, among them the late Jenny Lind, who was a near relative of the bishop's foreparents.

Bishop Lint is perhaps as widely known throughout the Dunkard church in the United States as any other minister in it. At annual meetings of the church he has always been a prominent figure, having served at the last meeting as a member of the standing committee, representing Western Pennsylvania. The bishop has hosts of friends wherever he is known.

Mrs. Lint occupies a place as prominent as her husband, the bishop, in this community and among the German Baptist Brethren of Western Pennsylvania. Wherever the bishop is known—and he has hosts of friends—Mrs. Lint is as popular as her husband. Mr. and Mrs. Lint enjoy good health and are still active in the work of the church and take a lively interest in the affairs of this place.

Hen's Rights.

There is a story of an old New Hampshire doctor who, on taking out a wagon that had not been used for some time, found that a hen was sitting in it. He merely "harnessed up" without disturbing her, and he and biddy made a series of calls. The Boston Herald offers this true story of the town of Amesbury, which owns a small fire apparatus:

Outside the fire limits is a small community that, on petition, received an appropriation for the purchase of a "handtub."

Last summer a stroke of lightning started a small fire in a farmhouse near by. The volunteer department rallied at once, but when they arrived at the engine house the foreman stood at the door.

"Don't touch her, boys!" cried he. "I've got two hens settin' in the box. Let's use buckets."

They agreed, and the hens were not disturbed.

Will Sue Cumberland Club.

It is rumored that Russell Pattison, recently released by the Cumberland base ball club, of the Cumberland and George's creek league, will sue that organization for back pay. Pattison was injured recently in a game with Piedmont, and it seems that the management of the Cumberland club "docked him" for the time lost while recuperating from his injuries. Folks up this way think Pattison has been treated rather shabbily by the Cumberland management.—Piedmont Herald.

MUNICIPAL BONDS WERE NOT SOLD

Insufficiency of Bids the Reason and They Will Be Sold at Auction

ON A DATE YET TO BE FIXED.

Other Proceedings of the Town Council at Its Regular Monthly Meeting Monday Night.

The July meeting of the Town Council was hold on Monday night last with all members of Council except Mr. Lauer, present.

The monthly bills for electric light, street work, police protection and incidental expenses were read and passed for payment.

A permit was granted the Board of County Commissioners to lay a sewer from the site of the new jail down Alder street to Third street and from Third street to the Davis alley, through said alley to the Little Youghiogheny river at a point to be designated later by Council.

The sale of municipal bonds for which bids were asked, was then taken up. They sale contemplated the transfer of $4000 of interest bearing coupon bonds, the proceeds to be used for the improvement of streets, but owing to an insufficiency of the bids the sale was not made and the bonds will be offered later a public auction, the date for such a sale to be later determined upon, when notice will be given.

Street Commissioner Wotring was instructed to construct a retaining wall or cribs along the south side of Liberty street fronting the residence of Mr. R. S. Jamison and abutting upon the railroad cut so that the street line at that point may be uniform.

An ordinance, relating to saloons, was passed, which is printed in full, as follows, the said ordinance to become effective on and after July 15th:

An ordinance requiring saloons and other places in which spirituous or fermented liquors are sold or served, to allow a view to be had of the interiors of said saloons, etc., on the day and during the hours they are required by law to be closed.

SECTION—1. Be it enacted and ordained by the Mayor and Town Council of Oakland, That during the hours and upon the days that saloons, rooms or other places in which spirituous or fermented liquors are sold, are required by law to be kept closed and the sale of said spirituous or fermented liquors is forbidden, that any and all blinds, curtains, swing doors, shutters or anything which prevents a view to be had of the interior through the glass of the outer doors and windows of said saloons, rooms or other places where said spirituous or fermented liquors are sold or served are to be lowered, put down, swung back or opened.

SECTION—2. Be it further enacted and ordained, That any person or persons, company, firm or corporation, its agents, servants or employees, who shall violate the provisions of this ordinance or who shall neglect to conform to the provisions of the same, shall for each time he, it or they may so violate or neglect the provision of this ordinance, be fined the sum of not less than one nor more than twenty-five dollars and the cost of prosecution, and upon failure to pay said fine and costs shall be imposed in the town lock up or county jail for not more than thirty days for each offense.

There being no further business Council adjourned.

DEATH OF MR. LOWNDES.

Young Man Dies Very Suddenly at His Home at Clarksburg, W. Va.

The community was shocked over a message from Clarksburg, W. Va., Thursday afternoon, stating that Mr. Richard T. Lowndes, son of the late Governor Lowndes, had died suddenly at his home at that place.

The deceased hurt his hand while punishing a man who had poisoned the former's dog, which resulted in blood poison. An operation was deemed necessary, but Mr. Lowndes died under the anesthetic.

Mr. Lowndes was married to Miss Mary McDowell, of Danville, Kentucky, and the fruit of that union is one son, Master Richard. Wife and one son are left to bear the burden of this heartrendering affliction while to a mother, four brothers and a sister the awful strain of accumulated grief demands its fearful exaction.

The remains were taken to Cumberland Friday night accompanied by Mrs. Lowndes and her son, Mr. and Mrs. Richard T. Lowndes, Sr., and Mr. W. Bladen Lowndes, who left at once for Clarksburg. Interment was made Sunday.

Circus at Darby's Ferry

Pap Perkins, Postmaster, Tells of a Scandal In Which Deacon Spooner Was Exonerated.

IT was several years ago, but Deacon Spooner is still shivering over his narrow escape. There was to be a circus over at Darby's Ferry, and a good many of the simple people of Jericho calculated on going. The ministers and deacons and other Christian people frowned upon the idea, of course, and Deacon Spooner in particular used all his influence to keep people at home.

Whatever got the matter with him on circus day he himself could never explain, but he got up at daylight and walked seven miles, and when the performance opened he had a front seat. A hundred Jericho people saw him there, but he didn't seem to care. In fact, he appeared to be having the best time possible, and he didn't even get conscience stricken over it when he got home.

Of course, such a break could not pass unnoticed. When Deacon Tyler heard of it, he called on Deacon Williams, and the two together called upon the minister and others, and it was decided to bring Deacon Spooner to book. He got scared about it and wanted to go to Iowa and visit his sister, but he was held on to and put on trial. When he was asked if he wanted to make a statement, he rose up and said:

"I said I wouldn't go to the circus, and I advised others not to go, and whatever got into me I can't understand. I went to bed feeling that circus performances was invented by Satan to trap the unwary and that my face was set agin 'em like a flint, but I got up at daylight and headed for Darby's Ferry and struck a gait of four miles an hour. I was there to see that circus come in. I was there when the ticket wagon opened. I was the first man inside the tent."

"Deacon Spooner, does insanity run in your family?" asked Deacon Tyler in very serious tones.

"No, it don't."

"Could you truthfully say that your mind was unhinged for the time being? Did you seem to be yourself or somebody else? If you was crazy of course we can't hold you to blame."

"No, I can't say as I was crazy," replied the deacon. "There was a buzzing in my ears a good deal of the time, but I guess that come from kickin' the bedclothes off and catchin' cold. I remember of buying lemonade and peanuts after I got there and of a feller tryin' to pick my wallet out of my pocket. No, I don't think I was out of my mind."

"But do you lay it to sinful curiosity?" asked Deacon Williams.

"I guess I'll have to. I'd been hearin' about circuses for the last fifty years and had never attended one. I heard Abner Jones telling about the lions and tigers and elephants and spotted horses, and it didn't seem so sinful as I'd allus thought for."

"THE FIRST THING I RUN UP AGIN WAS FOUR ELEPHANTS."

"But you found it sinful when you got there?" asked Moses Schemerhorn, who rings the bell for prayer meetings and thinks no windmill man can be saved in any shape.

"No, I can't say as I did," slowly replied Deacon Spooner. "That's the amazin' part of it. I had more fun than in chasin' down a wild hog or cleanin' out bumblebees, and I didn't see a single sinful thing. That's my defense—that I come home uncontaminated and untouched. I'm a-feelin' every bit as good as before I went."

There was a long drawn sigh and a shudder all around, and the minister said:

"Deacon, you may tell us what you saw there."

"Waal, the first thing I run up agin was four elephants. They was flappin' their ears and eatin' hay, and I didn't feel no sinful thoughts as I stood and looked at 'em. Can't a body see elephants and be saved too?"

"Go on, deacon."

"Then I took in the camels and ebras and giraffes. I looked at 'em over and over ag'in, but I didn't boil over and want to swear and fight. Fact is, I felt powerful peaceful over it. Is it agin me to look at critters with humps and stripes and long necks?"

"But they was connected with a circus," protested Deacon Tyler.

"Yes, I believe they was, but I couldn't help it. After I got through there, I went over to look at the rhinoceros. By gum, but he was a hefty critter. He weighed as much as two cows and a calf. I admit that I felt a little bit sinful when lookin' at him. I made up my mind that if a critter like that ever tackled me in the road at night I'd bust my suspenders tryin' to knock his horn off. It is too much to ask that my sin be overlooked?"

"We will hear further," said the minister, who wasn't looking so solemn as he might.

"Waal, they had an ostrich, two alligators, four hyenas and a sacred bull from India. I took 'em all in and nothin' happened. I didn't even feel like offerin' to bet that I could hoe two acres of corn in a day, old as I am. If I was hurt by seein' them critters and things I'm willin' to give in, but I'm sayin' that I don't feel like callin' any one a liar."

"And you didn't feel that you had sinned?" queried Moses Schemerhorn, as he shook his head in a solemn way.

"Not a feel. I even wanted the hosses to go faster and the fellers to flipflop the harder. When a feller come climbin' around with pink lemonade and charged me 10 cents for a small glass I did wish I had him in a ten acre lot for about two minits, but the feelin' passed off as soon as I had drunk the lemonade. I guess you'd have all felt the same, wouldn't you?"

The deacon was turned out of the room and the investigating committee went into executive session, and an hour later it had

Resolved, That while Deacon Spooner had attended the circus and was liable to feel sinful, he saw the animals first and didn't feel sinful, and is therefore exonerated from all blame and is advised not to do so again.

Booker T. Washington told the following story of an old southern darky who was sent for the first time to the postoffice to mail four letters:

His employer not having the necessary change to pay the postage, told the darky to pay it, and he would repay him the next day. The old negro started down the road and about an hour later reached the postoffice.

"Boss," he said, looking in through the stamp window, "how much do it tek ter sen' fo' letters for Massa Johnson?"

"Eight cents," replied the clerk from within the window.

"Dat so?" interjected the negro.

"Yes, uncle."

The old darky studied awhile, took out a leather bag and worried eight coppers out of the lining. Laying these on the counter, he drew a long breath and said:

"Well, yo' c'n let 'em go 'long."

"But where are the letters?" asked the clerk.

A Lesson at the Primaries.

Mrs. Dobbs waited until dinner was over and her husband had lighted his pipe before she handed over the note Willie brought from the teacher.

"My boy," said Dobbs when he had read it, "I understand from this that you are excused from school until the board of education has an opportunity to consider your case."

"Yes, sir," answered Willie, who had begun to whimper.

"Do you know what the board of education is, my son?"

"No, sir."

Dobbs went into the kitchen and got a good stout piece of board; then he summoned his son, and for several minutes he was busy with Willie.

"That, my son," he said as he finished, "is the only board of education we knew of when I was a lad."

BY LONG DISTANCE

By JAMES HOWARD

Copyright, 1908, by P. C. Eastment

"So, you see, some one had to stay at home," came the voice over the wire, "and I telephoned Gertie Bryan that I would not come until tomorrow."

"I'm sorry," answered Gerald Holland. "There was something I particularly wanted to say to you."

"Well?" provokingly.

"Cannot I come out?"

"No!" This with a little shriek. "It would not be proper. You see, I am entirely alone."

"Even the servants gone out?" he demanded.

Enid Allen gave a little laugh. "I forgot to tell you. The cook and the first girl went on strike this afternoon. They thought I could not get along without them, and I let them go, just to show them that I could. Then the coachman got drunk, and I had to dismiss him."

"Why can't you go to Mrs. Carter's for the night?" he suggested.

"There's an awful lot of money in the safe," she answered. "I've got to stay here and look after it. You see, father will need it tomorrow and won't have time to draw it when he gets back here."

"Have you any means of protection?" he asked.

"I've got that revolver I used in camp last summer," she laughed. "I guess I can use that if burglars come."

"I'm glad of that," he began, "but I wish"—

There came over the wire a succession of wild shrieks, the sound of a heavy fall, a shot, more shrieks, a second crash and then silence.

Frantically he shouted into the transmitter, but no answer came, nor could he hear a sound. He dashed the receiver upon the hook and rushed across the room, tearing off the house coat he had been wearing over his evening clothes.

Even in his terror and despair his mind had acted quickly, and he determined to go out to Crestcliff. The Allens had a handsome country home on the shore of the lake. It was only ten miles from the city, and Holland knew that he could make it in an automobile quicker than he could telephone to the station five miles beyond and have police help sent.

THE BURGLAR, WITH AN ENTIRELY FEMININE SHRIEK, DROPPED TO THE FLOOR.

A twenty-four horsepower touring car was in the stable at the rear of the house, with the tanks all filled in anticipation of an early run in the morning. He was glad now that he had seen to it that the car was ready to go out.

In less than five minutes he had donned furs, a leather cap and goggles and was tearing along the boulevard as rapidly as he dared. Two miles out the city line was passed, and he threw the lever over to the highest notch and with a tremendous spurt the big car shot ahead.

It was known that Mr. Allen frequently kept large sums of money in the house, and the discharged coachman must have known that there was money in the safe that night. The domestics were out of the way; it would be an easy matter to one familiar with the house to force an entrance and overpower the weak girl.

Under his breath he prayed that he might not be too late, but his fears had hold of him, and in spite of the rapid rush through the cold night the perspiration stood out upon his forehead.

He had hoped to see her at the Bryans' party that evening, and it was the announcement that she would not be there that had led him to call up Enid on his early return from the dinner which had preceded the dance.

He thought as he rushed along that he would have asked her to be his wife that evening. Now he wondered if he would find her lying mortally wounded upon the floor. Had she shot the burglar she would have answered. The shot must have been meant for her.

In less than twenty minutes he had covered the ten miles and stopped the car before the big gates of the park in which the Allen house sat. It would be better, he argued, to gain access to the house quietly. Possibly the assassin had not yet left the place. It would take some time to force open the safe.

There were lights in several of the rooms downstairs, and at the rear he found a door unlocked and softly entered. The telephone, he knew, was in the hall on the second floor, and thither he directed his steps, but as he passed the library he saw through the open door a man stooping over the safe, apparently at work on the combination.

Before he could make a spring the figure started up, and Gerald found himself looking down the barrel of a dainty revolver—the very weapon he remembered having seen Enid use the summer before in camp at Indian island, the one she had told him she would use for her protection. This man must have taken it from her body. Unmindful of the consequences, he made a leap and caught at the hand holding the weapon.

There was a flash, a report and a light blow on the arm. Then came a stinging sensation in the right arm, and just as the blood running down the sleeve reddened the hand the burglar, with an entirely feminine shriek, dropped to the floor.

The soft hat fell off, and great masses of dark brown hair, released from confinement, framed Enid's face. There was water and spirits on the table, and, hastily tying his handkerchief about his arm, Gerald knelt beside the limp figure and forced some brandy between her clinched lips.

In a moment she opened her eyes, regarding him dreamily. "What are you doing here?" she asked. Then, as it all came back to her, "Have I killed you?"

"Just a little flesh wound," he said reassuringly. "It's nothing serious. "But how do you come to be in this guise? I thought they had killed you."

"It was a mouse," she confessed shamefacedly. "I was talking to you and a great big mouse ran across the floor toward me. I threw the telephone book at it and broke a vase, but it only ran toward me. I jumped on a chair and fired my revolver at it. I was so scared I did not know what I was doing."

"But the crash right afterward?" he asked.

"I fell off the chair and struck my head against a corner. It stunned me for awhile, and when I could get back to the telephone you had gone."

"But how about the clothes?"

"Why, I thought there might be men hanging around, so I put on father's old coat and hat and went out on the porch so that if there were burglars about they would think it was a man."

She opened the coat to show the dainty house gown beneath, and in spite of the burning of his arm he had to smile. "Then you came in and mistook me for a burglar?" he laughed.

"That cap looked like a mask," she said defensively.

"I never thought of that," he exclaimed, "and you had your coat collar turned up so that it looked like a disguise. Well, you've captured me, although I'm no burglar, and you've got to keep me now."

She looked tenderly up from the arm she was dressing. "Forever," she whispered.

Stolen Applause.

A rector living in Ireland had an unpleasantness with the peasantry in regard to the payment of tithes, and it happened thereafter that when he or any of his family appeared abroad they were received with cries of "Mad dog! Mad dog!" and other shouts equally emphatic and unpleasant. The dean and his family were also saluted in like manner because they insisted upon visiting the proscribed citizen, and this gave rise one day to a curious incident.

Anstey, a poet popular in Dublin and well known there as the translator of Goethe's "Faust," drove from Limerick to Dublin in the car of the dean to make the latter a short visit. The usual shouting followed, but, being slightly deaf, the poet heard only the cries and not the words of threatening and abuse. At dinner he said to his host, with a beaming countenance:

"Mr. Dean, I never knew I was so well known down here. Fame surely travels farther than we think. I assure you that nearly the whole way from Limerick I was loudly cheered by the people."

A Modest Philanthropist.

Scroggins, the millionaire stage driver who founds a university in John Uri Lloyd's story "Scroggins," says, when he gives the money for the school: "I wants it to be remembered that I ain't a doin' this fer glory. There ain't no glory ter me in nothin' but drivin' the gulch stagecoach. I don't want no name of Scroggins, neither, stuck on to this hill university. I ain't a-givin' this money fer sech an object as that. Scroggins ain't pinched no widders nor orphans an' he hain't broke up no man's business fer ter git rich. He ain't ashamed of nothin' he hes done an' thar ain't no reason ter give this money in order ter stop people talkin' 'bout his meanness, er ter buy his way inter heaven. I'm goin' back ter stagecoachin'."

The Greenland Birch.

The midget of the whole tree family is the Greenland birch. It is a perfect tree in every sense of that term and lives its allotted number of years (from 75 to 130) just as other species of the great birch family do, although its height under the most favorable conditions seldom exceeds ten inches. Whole bluffs of the east and southeast coast of Greenland are covered with "thickets" of this diminutive species of woody plant, and in many places where the soil is uncommonly poor and frozen from eight to ten months a year a "forest" of these trees will flourish for half a century without growing to a height exceeding four inches.

A Poem for Today

A WISH

By Abraham Cowley

ABRAHAM COWLEY, English poet (1618-1667), writing "Of Myself," says: "That I was then of the same mind as I am now (which I confess I wonder at myself) may appear by the latter end of an ode which I made when I was but thirteen years old, and which was then printed with many other verses. The beginning of it is boyish, but of this part, which I here set down (if a very little were corrected), I should hardly now be much ashamed."

THIS only grant me—that my means may lie
Too low for envy, for contempt too high.
Some honor I would have,
Not from great deeds, but good alone.
The unknown are better than ill known:
Rumor can ope the grave.
Acquaintance I would have, but when't depends
Not on the number, but the choice of friends.

Books should, not business, entertain the light,
And sleep, as undisturbed as death, the night.
My house a cottage more
Than palace; and should fitting be,
For all my use, not luxury.
My garden painted o'er
With nature's hand, not art's; and pleasure yield.
Horace might envy in his Sabin field.

Thus would I double my life's fading space;
For he that runs it well, twice runs his race.
And in this true delight,
These unbought sports, this happy state,
I would not fear, nor wish, my fate,
But boldly say each night,
"To-morrow let my sun his beams display,
Or in clouds hide them; I have lived to-day."

Japan's Attitude Toward Korea and Manchuria

By SADAZUCHI UCHIDA, Japan's Consul General at New York

THE attitude of Japan in the present war is for the preservation of her national existence. Incidentally she is doing the fighting for China and Korea, for THEY ARE COWARDS. They do not dare to fight Russia, not even to prevent their territory from being partitioned. They do not dare to fight for their own interests.

IF CHINA AND KOREA WERE ANNEXED BY RUSSIA MY COUNTRY WOULD BE AT THE MERCY OF THE SULLEN BEAR. THAT IS WHY WE WANT THE INDEPENDENCE OF CHINA AND KOREA ASSURED.

We insist on the open door policy in China and Korea. If other nations get in there, China and Korea would be held from any PARTICULAR power in the western world. If Manchuria and Korea had more American, French and German and other nations interested in these two domains, Russia would not DARE annex those countries. That's why we want the open door for the protection of them.

We cannot tell when the war will end, but now that Port Arthur has been captured, now that the fate of Russia's army in Manchuria is doubtful, now that Russia has serious internal troubles, we have very optimistic hopes for final victory.

It is not premature to discuss what we will do and what other nations will do in the orient after the war is over. I will not discuss the political programme, but I can safely say WE MUST ENTER ANOTHER GREAT STRUGGLE not only against Russia, but against the whole civilized world—that is, a commercial and industrial fight for China and Korea. In order to gain success in these branches we must use great energy, a great deal of money AND GREAT RAPIDITY.

In those two countries there is a great property in commerce and industry, as great as in any country in the world. There are gold and iron mines, and many thousand miles of railroads can be built. There are many strongholds to be improved. WE MUST EDUCATE THE NATIVES.

If we make a success in the commercial and industrial interests in the two countries we can make a great future.

ENTERING UPON THAT KIND OF COMPETITION, EVERY OTHER NATION MUST BE SUPPOSED TO BE OUR RIVAL. WE MUST NOT BE FRIENDLY TO ANY. WE UNDERSTAND CONDITIONS BETTER THAN ANY NATION.

A Poem for Today

THE COLD WATER MAN

By John Godfrey Saxe

IT was an honest fisherman,
I knew him passing well;
And he lived by a little pond,
Within a little dell.

A grave and quiet man was he,
Who loved his hook and rod;
So even ran his line of life,
His neighbors thought it odd.

For science and for books he said
He never had a wish;
No school to him was worth a fig
Except a school of fish.

In short, this honest fisherman
All other toils forsook;
nd, though no vagrant man was he,
He lived by hook and crook.

He ne'er aspired to rank or wealth,
Nor cared about a name;
For, though much famed for fish was he,
He never fished for fame.

To charm the fish he never spoke,
Although his voice was fine;
He found the most convenient way
Was just to drop a line!

And many a gudgeon of the pond,
If made to speak to-day,
Would own, with grief, the angler had
A mighty taking way!

One day, while fishing on a log,
He mourned his want of luck—
When, suddenly, he felt a bite,
And, jerking—caught a duck!

Alas! that day this fisherman
Had taken too much grog;
And, being but a landsman, too,
He couldn't keep the log!

'Twas all in vain with might and main
He strove to reach the shore;
Down, down he went to feed the fish
He'd baited oft before!

The jury gave their verdict that
'Twas nothing else but gin,
That caused the fisherman to be
So sadly taken in.

Though one stood out upon a whim,
And said the angler's slaughter—
To be exact about the fact—
Was clearly gin-and-water!

The moral of this mournful tale
To all is plain and clear—
That drinking habits bring a man
Too often to his bier.

And he who scorns to "take the pledge,"
And keep the promise fast,
May be, in spite of fate, a stiff
Cold-water man at last!

The Fall of Richmond

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

April 2-3, 1865

[Copyright, 1905, by G. L. Kilmer.]

THE evacuation of Richmond and Petersburg by the Confederate government officials and the troops began at dark on the 2d of April, 1865. The Federal armies had invested Petersburg except where the Appomattox river protected it on the northwestern edge. Grant's lines rested upon the river below and above the town. Lee's first step after evacuation had been decided upon was the destruction of Confederate stores, boats, railroads, rolling stock and bridges and public property generally. The soldiers on the very front of the Federal line could hear the rumble of wheels on the bridges and reported to headquarters that the sounds indicated evacuation.

Some time after midnight—that is, early on the 3d—the magazine at Fort Drury, on James river, little more than halfway to Richmond, blew up, lighting the whole heavens. It was plainly visible on the Petersburg lines, and, as it was followed by other explosions, that of war vessels and bridges, and by fires nearer to Petersburg, it became very plain that a general destruction was going on along Lee's twenty miles of defenses. However, the Confederate pickets were out in full force, and every attempt of the Federal pickets to advance was met by good volleys of musketry. At daylight on the 3d the order was given on the Ninth corps line for pickets to advance to the enemy's main trenches. They did so and found the batteries empty and the camps deserted and denuded of everything valuable. Heavy guns had not been removed. A few Confederate skirmishers were overtaken, and it was learned that the bulk of the army had been gone for hours, the trains and artillery having begun to move at 8 o'clock p. m. on the 2d, the infantry following.

The brigade of General Ralph Ely—Second brigade, First division, Ninth corps—moved rapidly toward Petersburg, on the river road, and received the surrender about 4:30 a. m. The First division was promptly assembled and marched in by the regular roads. President Lincoln reached Petersburg about noon. Grant was already there, and there was hearty rejoicing among soldiery and citizens because the tedious siege was over. News came from Richmond that that stronghold had been entered by Federal troops at 8 o'clock in the morning. The Army of the Potomac rested around Petersburg, and General Grant went out on the South Side railroad, where a strong Federal column under General Ord was moving on a line parallel to that taken by Lee, the Appomattox river between their marching columns.

The experiences at Petersburg had been repeated at Richmond with the exception of the assaults. The Federal army confronting the defenses of Richmond consisted of two divisions of the Twenty-fifth corps of the Army of the James. General Godfrey Weitzel commanded the corps and was temporarily in command in front of Richmond. He had held his troops in readiness to assault for some days, but the success of the turning movement had rendered that unnecessary. Inside of Richmond confusion reigned all day on the 2d (Sunday), the day of the successful Federal assaults at Petersburg. Dispatches from Lee announcing his inability to hold his ground at Petersburg had caused the officers of the Confederate government to begin preparations for a hasty flight, and as they did not wait for night to cover their movements the people soon learned the truth and acted accordingly.

General R. S. Ewell commanded a few local Confederate troops in the defenses, and General G. W. C. Lee, son of General Robert Edward Lee, had a division in the Confederate works at Chapin's bluff, on James river, seven miles below the city. These troops were all put under orders ready to move. The men who had been prominent in secession affairs, the officials and pronounced disunionists betrayed their anxiety to be away when the Yankee troops should come in. Davis left the city at 8 o'clock, accompanied by his cabinet, and the archives and treasure, a sum unknown, but which included, $275,000 of bank gold, were shipped in cars. Darkness brought about a reign of terror. The stores of ammunition were exploded by military order, and the uncontrollable populace took this for a signal for destruction. Large warehouses containing tobacco, bacon and other combustibles were fired by accident or design, and the flames spread to other buildings. People gathered a few household goods and rushed to the squares and other open places.

The lower classes broke open liquor stores and fed their frenzy by the free use of stimulants. Pillage and outrage were added to fire and terror. Amid it all the explosives contained in the magazines, which were hoisted into the air, had their fuses ignited and flew in all directions, hurling down fragments of iron upon the crowds and sending fire indiscriminately upon dwelling, store and sanctuary. The Confederate troops were all otherwise engaged, and the police were powerless.

The bridges by which the Confederate troops were to evacuate the city were stocked with barrels of tar and pine knots, and these were fired at daylight just as the troops of Weitzel appeared before the works. No Confederates were in sight. The road between the buried torpedoes was marked out by flags, and the army moved in without the loss of a man or the firing of a gun. The Confederate navy lying in James river and commanded by Admiral Semmes, of Alabama notoriety, was destroyed by blowing up the vessels. Semmes and his sailors were formed into a provisional brigade and sent to Danville, the new capital that was to be.

When the Federal troops were fixed in the possession of the city General Charles Devens was charged with the duty of restoring order. His division stacked arms in the streets, and, with the aid of citizens, who were generally impressed for the service, they began to put out the fires. General Weitzel occupied Jefferson Davis' mansion as his headquarters. General R. E. Lee's wife and daughter were in their home and were furnished a guard. Mrs. Lee was an invalid confined to her room. Libby prison was empty, the prisoners having been removed and sent down the James to the place of exchange. In the works around Richmond and in the arsenals and foundries were about 500 heavy cannon that could not be removed. Several thousand sick and wounded Confederates were found in the vicinity, and these, with several small detachments captured along the lines, became Federal prisoners of war in Libby prison.

When the news of the Federal occupation of Richmond reached Petersburg, Admiral Porter, who commanded the Federal fleet, took President Lincoln on board the flagship and steamed up James river, where he landed on the 4th. Mr. Lincoln went on shore alone and was walking the streets, inquiring his way of passersby, when some of General Weitzel's aids met him and conducted him to headquarters in Davis' deserted mansion. Here he inspected the quarters of the fugitive Confederate chieftain and for a time sat in Davis' office room in his own accustomed chair.

While he was in Richmond Mr. Lincoln said to General Weitzel that he believed that the conquered people would be "let up easy." This was in accordance with his views expressed to Grant and Sherman in Hampton Roads in February, at the time he received the peace commissioners from Richmond. General Grant states in his memoirs that at that time Mr. Lincoln said that if the southerners would agree to perpetual union and the abolition of slavery he would be willing to hand them a blank sheet of paper with his signature attached and let them state the terms themselves.

At the very time when Abraham Lincoln was seated in the chair of the fugitive Confederate executive Jefferson Davis was attempting to reorganize his capital at Danville, where some troops had been ordered to report. Admiral Raphael Semmes was made a brigadier general and placed in command of the defenses, and his naval brigade built and mounted intrenchments. On April 5 Davis announced by proclamation that Virginia was to be abandoned by the Confederate armies. Lee was now concentrating his men in the vicinity of Amelia Court House, on the Richmond and Danville railroad, about twenty-five miles west of Petersburg. This point was south of the Appomattox, and Lee had to recross that river. The Confederate troops from Richmond and from the works along the James between Petersburg and Richmond all joined Lee at Amelia Court House.

In crossing the Appomattox river to the south, with the purpose of concentrating his scattered forces at Amelia Court House, Lee placed his immediate following on the same side of the river with General Ord's Federal column, which was then marching in the same direction to head off the Confederate retreat. Petersburg had become a thing of the past with Lee. Richmond, too, was a thing of the past. But the end was not yet. Grant's main army was still north of the Appomattox, and the bridge and ford crossings were still guarded by Lee.

SAILING TO DEFEAT.

The outrageous proposition the Democratic machine in Maryland is attempting to foist on this State is rushing to a crushing and bitter defeat. The amendment to the constitution by John P. Poe, prepared at the behest of Mr. Gorman and other politicians near to him is so infamous in its terms and scope that from the very beginning it has been bitterly opposed by every right thinking citizen of Maryland. The Governor used all his powers to prevent the amendment from being placed upon the ticket and has continued to fight it without cessation. Its iniquity surpasses that of every hideous and destructive partisan law concocted by daring and consciousness political combinations in this or any other country. The disfranchisement measure, which the Democratic "Ring" is endeavoring to make a law in this State, aims to place in the hands of their organization powers that will reduce the right of suffrage here to the level of that in Russia. If the disfranchisement measure becomes a law Mr. Gorman will call his lieutenants around him and they will select for each voting place officers of election who will do their bidding. If Mr. Gorman determines that one-half of the voters of the State should be deprived of their right of suffrage it can be done under the terms of this measure without any responsibility or danger attaching to the instruments he selects to carry out the work. If Mr. Gorman and Mr. Rasin wish, they can, under this proposed amendment, in the event it becomes a law, select a list of names in each county and in Baltimore city of persons whom they desire to vote; all others can be deprived of their right to do so. Under such a condition of affairs Mr. Gorman would name every official of this State from the Governor down to the scavengers in the cities. He could name the judges and could pack the judiciary to suit his own ends. This would place in the hands of the Democratic organization powers scarcely less arbitrary than those exercised by the Czar of Russia. The people of the State of Maryland, however, are not ready for any such condition to arise nor are they willing that any such conditions should exist here. The Republican party is solidly united to repel the attack on the rights and liberties of the people, united to protect from the aggressions of unscrupulous and practiced political grafters the liberties, the rights and privileges our forefathers died to obtain that their descendants might enjoy without question while earning their daily bread for themselves and for their families. With the Republican party also there are enlisted a large number of Democrats, all who have given the proposed law consideration, and there will be many more to join hands in the fight against it when they have more fully comprehended the meaning and intent of the measure that the Democratic machine is endeavoring with such brazen effrontery to force upon the statute books of the State. In various counties the Democratic conventions refused to endorse the amendment and in Baltimore city an organized movement is now on foot to fight this measure until its defeat is absolutely certain.

In Russia an aristocratic bureocracy has trampled on the rights of the people for years. Aggression after agression have passed unrebuked until their arrogance knows no limit and their shameless desire for power and wealth has steeled their hearts to the condition of the people and blinded their visions to the inevitable disaster that must overtake them. These power gorged lords sent forth a fleet of vessels into the Eastern Sea. Today this fleet is resting deep beneath the waves, vanishing within almost the twinkle of an eye. Incompetence, corruption, mismanagement and inefficiency marked its career from its formation to its end. The disfranchisement amendment formed and conceived by the Grand-dukes of the Democratic organization and its Czar bears a remarkable resemblance to Rojesvetsky's fleet. It left the office of John P. Poe, a monument of arrogance, a threat to the liberties and rights of the people and a cloak for the most unheard of political corruption. It will find its grave in November under the waves of popular disapproval as deep as that of the ill fated Russian fleet.

RUSSIA'S TROUBLES.

Troubles for the Russian Autocracy seem to multiply, as fast as one being abated another taking its place. In Russian Poland a condition of unrest exists that is only kept from open revolt against Russian domination by the sternest military measures. In the City of Lodz there has been a violent outbreak and roiting by thousands of striking workman and much blood has been shed in conflicts between the military and the rioters Comparative quiet has been restored, but nearly 600 people have been killed and over 1000 wounded in the strife. In some localities in Southern Russia, the peasants are burning property of landowners and a reign of terror exists.

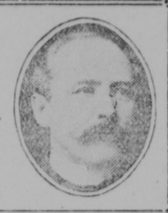
And now a mutiny has occurred on the battleship Kniaz Potemkine, on the Black Sea, the crew of which murdered all the officers and threw their bodies overboard. The crew of a torpedo boat also mutined and killed their officers. The mutiny on the battleship was caused by the summary shooting of a sailor by order of the commander. The vessel steamed into the harbor of Odessa and a portion of the crew landed with the body of their comrade, while those who remained on the ship threatened to fire on the town if the landing force were intertered with, and did actually fire a shell, which killed four Cossacks. All the shipping in the harbor of Odessa is reported in firmes. The latest reports indicate that the crews of others battleships have mutinied and that an uprising has taken place in Odessa in which many soldiers have joined with the rioters and mutinous sailors in a bloody battle with other Russian troops. Large number of people have been killed and many wounded and the town is reported in flames. The Russians soldiery is restless and fears of a military revolt are apprehended. All this may not mean a revolution, dut may be the prelude to it.

$25.00 Reward.

I will pay $25 to any one furnishing information that will lead to the arrest and conviction of the party or parties who poisoned our English setter dog Bunker on the evening of July 3, 1905.

MRS. BOWIE JOHNSON.

Politics and The Judiciary



By Ex-Judge ALTON B. PARKER

MEN chosen to fill judicial offices have not been mere party adherents. They have, in general, been devoted during their political careers to the organization AS WELL AS TO THE PRINCIPLES of their parties. They have, in fact, been the advocates of what one of the greatest of our modern leaders has defined as a "sturdy partisanship." This has been distinctive of that culminating judicial body of our own history and of the world, the supreme court of the United States.

Every chief justice has come to that high distinction after passing through the lanes, alleys, streets or highways of a party. As a rule they have gone through many grades of political effort, humble as well as high. And IN NO INSTANCE has this system brought to the bench a man who could be called or thought of as a political chief justice.

In my own somewhat extended judicial experience I have naturally come into close relations with a large number of judges of courts of both original and appellate jurisdiction and into personal contact with many more, but after all these years I can say that in no case have I ever known a single judge who, writing or concurring in a majority opinion, or, either by himself or in connection with his associates, dissenting in a minority opinion, has been moved by personal reasons OR BY ATTACHMENT TO A POLITICAL PARTY.

These considerations ought to give us pause before we consent to think that our life, society and system of government are growing worse or before we permit any revolutionary theories to drive us to the conclusion that old customs, manners or methods should be abandoned simply because they are old or because other governments or forms or systems have not adopted our simple and effective way of dealing with great and difficult human problems.

While the lawyer is almost a dominant force upon the higher table lands of our politics and in congressional and state legislative bodies; while he has fairly adapted himself to the change of methods, it may with truth be claimed of him that he has never yet become what is known as the great boss, that peculiar character incident to the later development of our practical politics. In many instances he has been able to command leadership, but it has never in a single instance involved dependence on politics for livelihood or fortune or the use of power FOR PERSONAL OR IMPROPER ENDS.

NOR HAVE PROMINENT LAWYERS BEEN FOUND IN PUBLIC LIFE OR OUT WHO WERE WILLING TO STAND BEHIND MEN WHO BORE THIS RELATION TO OUR POLITICS AND TO SHARE WITH THEM THE SPOILS WHICH ARE SUPPOSED TO BE THE INCIDENTS OF THEIR POSITION.

As no lawyer ever attains a position so commanding that he may not be assigned by the court, whose servant he is, to defend the prisoner of the lowest grade and of most probable guilt, so he carries with him through life the obligation to do all that lies in his power to save the institutions of his country from the harm that may be done by the RECKLESS AGITATOR who would destroy what is merely because it exists, who would raze the old structure MERELY BECAUSE IT IS OLD, not because it is ugly, but, perhaps, for the very reason that it has in it some of the elements of that beauty the consciousness of which has never so much as entered into the mind of such a man.

Print the grandest sermon that ever fell from inspired lips and not 20 per cent. even of the professedly pious will read it, but print a detailed account of some female bunko game or a sensational divorce in high life, and 99 per cent. of the very elect will make a dive for it before breakfast, swoop down on it like a hungry nigger on a bowl of crab soup, devour every word then roll their eyes heavenward, like a calf with the colic, bemoaning the wickedness of the world.

A kind word for the hen from the Queen City Courier: "The cackle of an old hen on the farm draws but little attention, and a single egg is a small thing but put a whole lot of these cackles together and pile up these little eggs and you have something to talk about. The hens of the United States are better trust busters than the President and his Cabinet. A big output of eggs means large numbers of chickens, and that means defiance of the meat trusts to a considerable extent. Cultivate the hen crop."

This is the season of the year when you begin to hear from your city friends, and they insinuate how well they would enjoy a couple of weeks visit at your home The farm would be less attractive for city folks at this season of the year if every farmer would make a practice of working the company from the city in as weed destroyers. And why not? It would do the city chaps good and help the farm besides. By the way, too, did you ever get as many invitations to visit friends in the city as city friends accept from you to visit on the farm?

He was married about two years ago and leaves besides his wife one son, a number of brothers and other relatives to mourn his death. A COMMON DUTY.

Every man, woman and child in the United States is interested in the question of improved highways. The failure of a hundred years of local systems has shown that the country can never have a system of good roads except by the aid and cooperation of the general government. Bills were introduced in the last two Congresses providing for this very thing—the original bill in the House of Representatives by Hon. W. P. Brownlow, of Tennessee, followed by a similar bill in the Senate by Hon. A. C. Latimer, of South Carolina; the first a Republican and the latter a Democrat. The Brownlow-Latimer bills will be introduced again this coming winter, and the strongest effort will be made to enact them into law. The friends of good roads have a duty to perform just here and now, and we would address this not alone to the farmer, but to the merchant, manufacturer, lawyer, doctor, mechanic, and all other citizens, not omitting the minister. Use your influence with your Senator and Representative. This is the only way to get this national legislation. Write them personal letters. Where you can, talk to them. Let them understand that you know what you want. You must convince them by overwhelming demand, just as the pure-butter law; just as every interest that secures desired legislation convinces them. Every argument is in favor of national aid to good roads. The question of constitutionality has been settled. The question of necessity has never been disputed. The existence of reciprocal obligation between the government and the people has ever been an open one. The government belongs to the people. The money that gets into the treasury belongs to the people. The time has come for the people to make concerted demand for the return to them of some part of that which is their own. Good Roads would do more for the country than any other one thing that can be named. It is a fact of history that no country ever built good roads without the aid of the general government. No country ever will, because the local property cannot afford it, and never in all the history of the world has it been able to except in the centers of wealth. If the people want good roads, they must wake up and get to work. Don't wait for somebody else to start. Get your demand in on your own Representative and Senators. If all who favor the Brownlow-Latimer good-roads bills will do this, favorable action may be expected. Without this concert of action, Congress will do nothing. Brownlow and Latimer can't do the work alone. It is the common duty of the people to flood Representatives and Senators with letters, demanding this good-roads legislation.

Mr. Jackson had fished at the same spot every summer for the past forty years and seemed thoroughly familiar with the stream. He was a widely known citizen and leaves a wife and six children: Charles W. Jackson, Sioux City, Iowa; Mrs. Mary Ranway, Newberg, W. Va.; John Jackson, San Francisco, Cal.; Frank Jackson, Preston county, W. Va.; Mrs. I. G. Lazelle, Morgantown, W. Va., and Mrs. Robert A. Ramsey, Kingwood.

By an Act of the General Assembly of Maryland, passed at the January session, 1890, being Chapter 506, Section 45, it is provided that all county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of levy thereof; and on all taxes paid on or before the said first day of September a discount of three per cent. shall be allowed; and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum until paid. THERE isn't a very great departure from the styles of a year ago, but there is sufficient to catch the critical eye. The double-breast Sack Suits have the advantage still further this spring in popular flavor. Both the double and single breasteds are a trifle longer—about an inch say, and they are cut a little fuller in the back. ¶ The extreme loose-fitting double-breast have a very long lapel. Hezekiah's Prayer.

That good sovereign, Hezekiah, the twelfth king of Judah, was in the very midst of his far-reaching reforms—reversing the evil policy of his father, both in foreign and domestic affairs. He had either witnessed the destruction of Sennacherib, or else the Assyrian invasion was just then impending. He was as yet without an heir to his throne, and being in the heydey of young manhood thought of providing for a successor seems not to have crossed his mind. At such a time the sudden announcement of his immediate demise took the nature of a personal and national disaster. He was the last man to be spared. How could reforms proceed without him? How could the desolating tide of invasion be staved if he did not stand in the fore?

Under the circumstances the message of Isaiah to Hezekiah seems curt, if not cruel, "Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die and not live." But the personal relations of love and confidence which maintained between the two men make it improbable that there was anything harsh in the manner in which the message was delivered, or resentful in the way it was received.

The suffering king turned his face to the wall of his chamber. He did not wish to see or be seen. He converted the intervening space into an oratory, in which he was alone with God. There he gained a greater victory than he ever gained in counsel chamber or on battle-field. He struck the personal element from the equasion. With the self-oblivion of a lofty nature he rose above the question of profit or loss to self. He was the father of his people, and how should they do if left fatherless? He could call God to witness the integrity and self-denying record of his reign, and plead the probability that this record would maintain to the close, to the glory of God and the welfare of the people.

The test had been made. In the hotest crucible the unalloyed gold of the king's character had been proven. The grief-stricked prophet had not yet quite crossed the palace courtyard after delivering the dread message, when he was halted and bidden to recall it. Space will be given the king to consummate his reforms and defend his empire against invasion.

Concession is made to a sign-loving spirit. From the bed-chamber window the king and the prophet look down upon the terrace, where the "step-clock" of Ahaz stands. They see a marvel. The shadow returns ten steps on the dial, which it had covered.

The ransomed king breaks out in a hymn of praise, improvised after the manner of the East, which is one of the jewels of the old Scripture. "He thought he must needs go hence in the noontide of his days. His abode was plucked from above him like a shepherd's tent. He had rolled up his life as a weaver cuts the cloth from the loom. But he found himself withheld from the bottomless pit. Death does not praise God. The living, the living, He praises Him."

The Teacher's Lantern.

The Bible delights to picture its heroes not in forensic arena nor in field of battle, but in act and attitude of prayer—Abel at his alter; Noah on dripping rocks of Arrat, Moses on the heights, with Aaron and Hur holding up his weary arms; Daniel at his window, open toward Jerusalem; Peter on the house-top; Paul in Straight Street, and many others.

* * * * *

We have two pictures of Hezekiah at prayer; both vivid significant. In one instance it is prayer for the nation; in the other for himself. In the latter instance, indirectly at least, it was a prayer for the nation also, and so, largely disinterested. Probably this was chiefly the ground on which it was heard.

* * * * *

Hezekiah had an instinct for prayer. He could pray at a moment's notice. The bird is not always flying; but it is ready to fly at an instant. We need not pray literally without ceasing; but we can be ready to spread the pinions of the soul and speed to the mercy-seat any instant.

* * * * *

There was, of course, an unexpressed condition in the apparently categorical message, "Thou shalt die."

* * * * *

It is an open question whether it is discreet to let persons know that death is imminent. Isaiah was sent to tell Hezekiah. He had no option in the matter.

* * * * *

The narrative is true to the Eastern temperament when it tells us that the doomed king wept aloud. The Orient is demonstrative. It never restrains its emotions, either of joy or sorrow.

* * * * *

"Set your house in order" is as good an advice for the living as for the dying. For to be ready to live, is to be ready to die.

* * * * *

It has been admirably said that prayer is not overcoming God's reluctance, but taking hold of His willingness.

* * * * *

There are great gains of going down into the valley of the shadow of death. Hezekiah was a good man before; but he was a better man and king ever after that experience. But the gains do not accrue arbitrarily. Many go down and return empty-handed. One needs to think and remember.

* * * * *

Isaiah used and honored the materia medica of his day, when he placed the poultice of figs upon the king's wound. Means are never to be discarded.

* * * * *

There is a good and an evil sign-seeking. Jesus discriminated between them. His evil generation asked, but really did not want any sign. Unalterably set in their prejudice, the greatest wonder would have left them unconvinced. No sign was given such.

* * * * *

Hezekiah, like Gideon, felt the need of some visible token, and it was not withheld. A more appropriate sign could not be conceived of. The recession of the shadow meant added time.

* * * * *

The paragraph introduces the reader to one of the ever-living heroes of the world. Like the onyx stones on the high priests' shoulders, piety and patriotism were Isaiah's ornaments. He was a royal spirit, whether he was literally of kingly descent or not. His writing is as ever-living as himself. Dull mind that which is not moved by it!

LITTLE SERMOMS, NO. 1.

BY UNCLE JAY BEE.

If 'at this moment' any person or power could stop all strife, as between men and nations, before that sun in mid-heaven again hides his drey face behind yon mountains, peace, sweet and blessed peace, would fill the whole wide world, even as the waters fill the wide seas, or the blessed sunlight the bright blue heaven above and around us.

And, a world full of peace!—what a changed world it would be. How different from anything we have hitherto seen; would not this be a very heaven on earth?

Now, think for a moment, what a boom, what an unspeakable blessing that "person or power" above supposed, would confer upon this strife-troubled world by such an achievement. Why the mind can scarcely grasp the vastness of the change, or the richness of the blessing. All strife ended: peace everywhere! Then no more wars, murders, beatings, woundings: no more harm by one to other, only as by accident. Then no more litigation before courts or juries; every family, community and state quiet, loving, orderly and happy.

How can or may this be brought about?

By each one "Following after things that make for peace."

And what are these "things?" They live in the spirit of the ten commandments; they breath in the love of the beatitudes. Following in the Master's foot-steps, leads to peace: doing as Jesus would, makes end of strife.

And so living is happiness; so doing is blessing the world.

ANGORAS WERE HIS UNDOING

Farmer Was Sorry He Heeded Secretary Wilson's Advice.

President Roosevelt has a joke on his Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. Jas. Wilson, because of the bulletin on Angora goats. A New Hampshire farmer received one of those documents, and he has now written to the President, telling the troubles that have come to him because of the information that bulletin contained. The text of the letter was made public yesterday as follows:

"Mr. President: I regret to call your attention to the Angora goat department of the Bureau of Agriculture. It has spread broadcast a document commending Angoras to the farmers of the country. This contains three specious landscapes: Before goating shows a dense jungle, suggestion the average New Hampshire pasture: 'One Year After Goating' shows the same land producing a valuable crop of bean poles. 'Two years After Goating' shows a lawn suitable for golf links. The omniverous appetite of Angoras is described in a way that led me to hope they might even effect a saving in blasting powder, the chief source of expenses in farming hereabouts.

"I procured a flock at considerable cost. The result of the first interview of my dog and the buck caused me to name the latter Togo. His views on the subject of race suicide, I think, would receive your approval. The does, on the other hand, neglect their kids so shamelessly that I fear they belong to a female goat club.

"I inclosed the flock with a fence highly recommended to me by the American Steel and Wire Company. I now suspect that this company may be a trust and should be investigated The goats began by thrusting their heads through the upper part of the fence, where they hung by the horns. When tired of this, they went through, under and over the fence.

"I make no complaint that they ate a valuable rose garden belonging to a neighbor; but their conduct in my own vegetable garden entitles me to relief. When pursued, their rapidity of movement might suggest ideas to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in connection with its Chicago-New York service. If interested, it can obtain the flock on easy terms, not necessitating a new bond issue.

"I leave the matter, Mr. President, to your sense of justice. A consulate near good fishing ground would be appreciated by

Mr. Bowser Vs. Poetry

He Is Admitted to the Burns Club and Attempts to Write Some Verses.

HIS MUSE THROWS HIM

Takes a Cropper When Mrs. B. Criticises What He Is Pleased to Call "Poetic License."

[Copyright, 1905, by R. B. McClure.]

WHEN the Bowsers had finished dinner the other evening Mr. Bowser lighted his cigar, smiled amiably on the cat, swelled out his chest and remarked to Mrs. Bowser:

"I had forgotten to say that I have been elected a member of the Burns club."

"Is that the club that makes the Jonathan Burns cigarettes?" innocently queried Mrs. Bowser in reply.

He looked at her in indignation for a minute and then said:

"I suppose you can't help it, and therefore I can't hold it up against you. If you knew half as much about poetry as you do about bargain sales

"SAY, JONES, DID YOU EVER WRITE ANY POETRY?"

in toilet soap you would know that I meant the club of poets. It is said to be one of the most exclusive clubs in America, and there are plenty of millionaires who'd give their old boots to become members."

"And why can't they?"

"Why? Simply because they can't write poetry."

"And you have been elected because you can?"

"When I sent in my application two months ago it was accompanied by a verse of poetry that the committee was pleased to call a little gem of its kind. I shall devote the evening to composing something in the nature of a poem."

Mr. Bowser walked up and down with his cigar in the corner of his mouth and a chesty look below his chin, and Mrs. Bowser and the cat watched him and realized that they were in for another family row.

"You didn't say anything to me about writing the poetry," she finally observed.

"No? Well, it was such a trifle that I supposed it skipped my mind."

"But don't you want my help on what you write tonight?"

"Not hardly, Mrs. Bowser; not hardly," he answered in lofty disdain.

She turned to a magazine without further remark, and he got a paper pad and pencil and sat down and rolled his eyes heavenward and made ready to start in. The cat had an appointment in the back yard to meet and knock out an old tom who had been cuffing all comers about, but as he left the room he gave a look backward at Mr. Bowser and said to himself:

"Old man, things seem to be coming your way just this minute, but the evening isn't over yet."

Mr. Bowser had figured on dashing off three or four verses within ten minutes, but when a quarter of an hour had elapsed he had not yet finished the first. He was scratching his head and nibbling at his pencil when Mrs. Bowser queried:

"Well, how do you get along with your poetry?"

"Beautifully. I am only hesitating over the choice of terms. You can't help me any, of course, but I will read you what I have written:

"The sylvan sun is going down,
The brooklet onward flows;
The turgid mountain rears its head—

"And that is what I was hesitating about—the fourth line."

"Mr. Bowser, may I make a remark?"

"Certainly. It can't be anything in the nature of a hint to me, but you can make it."

"The dictionary defines the word 'sylvan' as forestlike—rural—rustic. How can you apply it to the sun?"

"I am writing of the country."

"But the same sun is to be found in the city. You can't call the sun rustic, can you?"

"That is simply poetic license, and you know nothing about it."

"But you speak of a turgid mountain. The dictionary defines 'turgid' as swelled—bloated. You don't intend to refer to a bloated mountain, do you?"

"I intend to refer to anything I please, Mrs. Bowser, and I want no criticism from you. When did you ever write a single verse of poetry to give you the right to criticise me?"

Mrs. Bowser was duly crushed and turned to her book. Mr. Bowser reluctantly acknowledged to himself that he might have got things a trifle mixed, and he scratched out the incompleted verse and tried again. He did not intend to give her another chance, but at the end of the third line again he found himself stuck. It wouldn't do to admit it, and so he said:

"So many beautiful thoughts come rushing in on me that I hardly know which to use. Just for the fun of the thing let me ask how you would end this verse:

"I wander alone, with my soul at peace;
I muse in the truculent dell;
My lubricant soul, like a golden bowl"—

"I should end it," replied Mrs. Bowser, "with making 'dell' rhyme with the bad place."

"By thunder, woman, but do you mean to insult me to my face?"

"Of course not. You asked me how I would end it, and I told you. There are one or two other things I want to speak of. You refer to a 'truculent dell.' Do you mean a peaceful one?"

"Any idiot could tell that I do."

"Well, if you will turn to the dictionary, you will find that 'truculent' means wild—fierce—savage."

"What in the name of seven bobtailed cats do I care for what the dictionary says? Was old Webster a poet? Did he know poetry from pumpkins?"

"Perhaps not, but he tells us how to pronounce words and gives us the meaning of them. What do you mean when you speak of your 'lubricant soul?'"

"None of your business."

"A lubricant is an oil, you know. You lubricate the machinery of a sawmill. When you grease a bucksaw with a pork rind you lubricate it. That verse would read beautifully as:

"I wander alone, with my soul at peace;
I muse in the truculent dell;
My lubricant soul, like a golden bowl,
It slips on its way with a yell."

"By John!" gasped Mr. Bowser as he sat and stared at her while the red flushed his face.

"If I am disturbing you I beg pardon," she answered.

"By John, by John, but the idea of your talking to me like that! Am I awake or dreaming? Woman"—

"I don't see anything to get excited about," she interrupted. "I simply referred you to the dictionary to show you that you had misused a word or two. If your 'lubricant soul' had gone into the Burns club it might have affected your standing there. I should change it to 'innocent soul,' for you have an innocent soul, Mr. Bowser."

Mr. Bowser got up and choked and gasped and coughed, but the words he was fishing for would not come. The cat had returned after his victorious scrap; but, though he offered a fair mark, he was not kicked at. There was a long minute of direst suspense, and then Mr. Bowser flung himself down the hall and out of doors, taking his two incompleted verses with him. He didn't know who to go to, but he was determined to find out about that "lubricant soul." Fortune favored him. He met his coal man almost at the gate, and, after salutations had passed, he asked:

"Say, Jones, did you ever write any poetry?"

"Tons and tons of it, but I never gave more than 1,800 pounds for a ton."

"And you are up on words?"

"Clear to the top."

"Well, what is the meaning of a lubricant soul?"

"A lubricant soul? That's dead easy. It means a soul that has just been greased up with lard?"

"You are an infernal old liar!" shouted Mr. Bowser.

"And you are a jackass! Good night!"

Half an hour later Mrs. Bowser went to the front window and saw Mr. Bowser huddled up on the steps. Two old tramps stood at the gate looking at him and wondering whether he was drunk or asleep, but his lubricant soul heeded them not—heeded not the March winds, the cold stone steps, the truculent people who hurried on their turgid way. He had come down with a thud.

Say! Th' youngster could ride
Anything with a hide
On its back where th' hair was a-growin' outside,
Roll a good cigarette
On his hoss on a bet
When th' cayuse was buckin' an' never lost yet.

Sittin' there in th' camp,
Sort o' worn out an' damp
An' his hoss ga'nt an' tired fr'm a ninety mile tramp
Through th' snow an' th' sleet,
An' he took liquor neat,
F'r th' stuff seemed to be both his drink an' his meat.

I dunno! Somethin' hot
Passed between 'em—a shot,
An' th' other man drawed summat slower 'n he ought.
Well! It wasn't much loss,
But th' big buckskin hoss
That he tuk when he skipped was th' pride o' th' boss!

'Tain't because that galoot
That he killed with a beaut
Of a shot had an idee he knew how to shoot.
Ef he jest hadn't tuk
That especial ol' buck-
Skin th' boss broke hi'self 'twouldn't matter—wuss luck!

Got a price on his head,
An' th' ranch boss, he said
He'd prefer him alive, but he would take him dead.
'Cause a man ain't much loss,
But it's time, says th' boss,
That all plainsmen was learnin' a hoss is a hoss.

Inexpensive Summer Outing.

Simkins—Are you going to take your family to the country this summer?

Timkins—No; we are going to remain at home and enjoy all the pleasures of rural life at half the cost.

Simkins—How will you manage it?

Timkins—By putting a few bricks in the mattress, removing the fly screens from the windows and laying in a supply of canned meats and vegetables.—Chicago News.

The Danger.

"No," said Mrs. Bounce, "I don't know as there's any real harm in smoking—that is, in itself—but when two or three men get together, puffing at their cigars or pipes, they seem so contented and so happy that I fear they forget what sinful creatures they are. There's where the harm comes in, Mrs. Green, as I've said to Bounce a hundred times if I've said it once."—Boston Transcript.

They Own Some of 'Em.

Certain authors sign so many contracts with publishers the latter have become "proprietors" of their time and talent. For instance:

"I'd like to see the new author," said the stranger.

"Can't," replied the publisher. "He's feeding just now. I've just turned him in to breakfast."—Atlanta Constitution.

Too Much Expected.

Mother—Harold, I'm surprised to see you so discourteous to your sister's little friends.

Harold—Huh! It's bad enough to have to be polite to Dorothy. I can't be putting on airs to all the kids in town.—Brooklyn Life.

Well Named.

Motor Cyclist—I see that Muggins has named his automobile after his wife. Isn't that a queer proceeding?

Bicyclist—Not at all. He didn't name his machine until he discovered he couldn't control it. I think the name very appropriate.—Albany Journal.

Rapid Transit.

Conductor—Fare—

Passenger—I paid my fare when the train started.

Conductor—There was only a small boy aboard when we started.

Passenger—Well, that's me.

Farewell.

"You say this is to be your star's farewell tour?"

"Yes," answered the manager. "It is an opportunity for the public to say goodby to some more of its money."—Washington Star.

A Pretty Good Indication.

Gerald—I wonder whether I shall be numbered with the sheep or the goats on the day of judgment?

Geraldine—Well, you are always butting in.—Judge.

Journalism and The New Diplomacy

By WHITELAW REID, Ambassador to Great Britain

THERE can be no doubt that journalism has come to be the most powerful of all professions in civilization. I am not so sure that in its instant influence for good or evil it is not more powerful THAN ALL OTHER PROFESSIONS COMBINED.

Whatever tendency there may be toward greater candor and openness in the conduct of international intercourse today is largely due to the part played by honest, serious AND RESPONSIBLE journalism in effacing unnecessary differences and unjust prejudices which once served to prevent a good and friendly understanding between the widely separated peoples of the earth. By presenting the daily life and thinking the daily thought of the world sincere and intelligent journalism has impressed upon the mind of mankind a realizing sense of the identity of human purpose everywhere, of the likeness of all organized communities, of the horror AND WASTEFULNESS of war, and so it has served to clear the way for future peace and orderly progress.

Of course I am not speaking of that part of the newspaper press which strains for catchpenny success and circulation by ANY means, worthy or unworthy. I do not include in what I say newspapers which, so to speak, "dash blood in the face of the public" in order to produce excitement and gain readers at the risk of the public peace and welfare. Fortunately such journals have no deep or lasting influence upon public opinion in a country like this. They may ripple the surface of things, but as a rule they cannot disturb the great tidal movements of national thought. It is true that newspapers have played upon the national prejudices and that we have known the time when they produced war. But on the whole it is the journalism which is guided solely by definite moral considerations and which reflects the SOBER SECOND THOUGHT, the justice and common sense of the country, which prevails in the end.

Looking back over the long period of my own active service in journalism, I can say without hesitation that disinterested patriotism and moral principles are more than ever guiding the work of the great newspapers which are recognized as the responsible daily agencies of public opinion in the great nations which we are accustomed to regard as belonging to our own group or family. It is a fact beyond dispute that the utterances of the really great and powerful newspapers of America are inspired by men who bring to their examination of public questions THE HIGHEST ETHICAL PURPOSE and a careful and courageous desire to serve the public welfare. Such men may make mistakes, but it is seldom due to intention, but rather to misinformation.

THEY SERVE THE TRUTH AS THEY SEE IT. TRUTH IS A GREAT FACTOR IN PEACE AND PROGRESS.

There is no great secret about the foreign policy of the United States. Secretary Hay was well within the facts when he said that our policy in international matters was chiefly the Golden Rule and the Monroe doctrine. I have ventured to complete the illustration by adding the Dix doctrine, "If any man attempts to pull down the American flag, shoot him on the spot," because the American people will never permit their representatives to keep or regain even so priceless a boon as peace AT THE PRICE OF INJUSTICE. Our government has always meant to be frank, direct and just in its dealings with other nations.

IF THERE IS A NEW DIPLOMACY AS DISTINGUISHED FROM THE OLD IT IS LARGELY DUE TO THE INFLUENCE OF JOURNALISM UPON THE PUBLIC MIND, WHICH HAS MADE IT POSSIBLE FOR GOVERNMENTS TO TAKE THE PEOPLE INTO THEIR CONFIDENCE DURING THE PENDENCY OF OFFICIAL INTERNATIONAL NEGOTIATION.

Togo's Victory as Great as Nelson's

By Baron HAYASHI, Japanese Minister to Great Britain

WE all rejoice at Togo's victory. We had confidence he would not be so badly beaten as the Russians thought he would be, but at the same time we were not entirely free from anxiety concerning the outcome of the long expected naval battle. Now we feel quite easy in our minds and THE REMAINDER SEEMS EASY.

Regarding whether this fight will prove a step in the direction of peace we cannot judge. Outsiders cannot express an opinion of any value on this point. The question must be regarded FROM THE RUSSIAN STANDPOINT. One thing is certain, this makes further naval and military operations very easy. If the war continues Vladivostok may become a second Port Arthur. It seems impossible under the circumstances that Russia will send more ships to the far east.

We consider the victory as the most DECISIVE of modern times.

Its effect will be far reaching, and it will have an influence not only on the future of the far east, but also on Europe.

RUSSIA CAN NO LONGER BE RECKONED WITH AS A NAVAL POWER. IT IS MY OPINION THAT TOGO'S VICTORY IS ON A PAR WITH THAT OF NELSON, ACHIEVED A CENTURY AGO THIS YEAR.

Race Hatred In the United States

By EDWIN D. MEAD, Prominent Sociologist

MUNICIPAL corruption is not the only evil whose shame has burned itself into our souls. Race hatred in this country is ALMOST UNPARALLELED.

THERE IS NO NATION CALLING ITSELF CIVILIZED WHERE LAWLESSNESS IN ALL DEPARTMENTS OF LIFE IS SO GENERAL.

This condition has come very largely from our great materialism, and it is for the LEADERS OF RELIGIOUS OPINION to stir up such a feeling in this country as shall lead to reform in this respect.

The God In the Hurdy Gurdy

By CASPAR JOHNSON

Copyright, 1905, by K. A. Whitehead

It was a narrow alley, running between the back yards. It was intended for the convenience of the butcher's boy and the grocer's boy and the ash man. Distinctively it was not intended for men of Pasquale Venetti's stamp. Indeed, a sign at either end announced this in no uncertain terms.

"Beggars, Peddlers and Street Musicians Keep Out," it read.

But to Pasquale Venetti warning signs in English had no terrors from the simple fact that written English was beyond his ken. Therefore as he came trundling the ancient hurdy gurdy up the street he looked into the alley, saw its possibilities—the ease with which coins could be tossed from the back windows—and, forsaking the asphalt pavements, where, to use his own expression, he could "no getta de biz," he turned into the alley and, unlimbering his musical battery, sent up the quavering strains of "Lindy, Lindy, Yo' Is Ma Ladylove."

It is a hard, cold world. Pasquale ground away patiently, and whenever a face appeared at any of the windows he smiled expansively, removed his battered hat and bowed profoundly and even essayed a joyful shuffling of his feet while he turned the crank. But, despite all these blandishments, to say nothing of the appeal made by a choice assortment of selections, ranging from the classic to ragtime, no coins wrapped in white paper came jingling to his feet. To be sure, one fat cook came out to the back gate and after he had played half through the hurdy gurdy's assortment gave him a penny, and an old gentleman had raised an upper window and, with a thundered "Get out of this!" had flung him a dime. But 11 cents from such a promising alley! Pasquale resented his ill treatment and moved farther up the alley.

No better success attended him here. He whistled, he danced, he sang. He smiled his best and bowed his lowest. He tried the intermezzo and "Ma Filipino Man" with an equal lack of success. He had his labor for his pains.

He moved to the far end of the alley, with a view to quitting it. He made one final stand, however, before the back of an imposing house. With a sinking heart he sent up the jerky bars of a march from a popular light opera. The house, like all the others, was unresponsive. Then he shifted to ragtime. He decided to play through his repertory anyway. If it failed, he would go back to the asphalt pavements and try his luck somewhere downtown before a restaurant or a promising saloon.

SUDDENLY AT HIS FEET WAS A YELLOW COIN.

Now, it happened that in the big, dim back parlor of the imposing house sat two young people, and a single glance showed that they were not happy.

The man sat very stiff and straight in his chair and bit his lips. The girl was seated on a low divan. Her face was flushed and her eyes glowed angrily.

"It is far too much to forgive this time," she was saying. "I have forgiven and forgiven—eternally forgiven—and now I am tired."

The man replied coldly.

"Perhaps you are right," he said in a strained voice.

"And the sooner it's over the better, now," said the girl, choking.

The man started up. Whatever remonstrance he was about to make he stifled.

"Very well," he said curtly.

The girl pulled a ring from her finger and laid it on the table beside the man. He took it without a word and put it in his pocket.

"I might say"—he began slowly.

"All you could say would make no difference," she said wearily.

The man rose and strode to the window. Pasquale was grinding away assiduously. At the sight of the man in the window he snirked and bowed and shuffled his feet. The man smiled bitterly.

"Lucky, happy devil!" he muttered.

Then he turned to the girl and drew himself up stiffly.

"I may as well say goodby," said he.

She made no reply.

"Goodby," he said again.

"Goodby," she returned evenly.

The man hesitated a moment; then he strode to the door. In the alley Pasquale had come to the last piece in his repertory. It was a poor imitation of portions of Schubert's "Serenade." Just as the man reached the door the jingling notes floated in from the alley. The man paused. A look of pain came into his face.

Those jerky notes brought memories with them—memories of a big, dark music room with two little spots of red in the gloom where the candles burned on the piano; of a girl beneath the candles—a girl with white neck and gleaming shoulders, playing the serenade very softly; of a few breathless words whispered over her shoulder; of a pair of luminous eyes which flashed an answer that set his heart pounding madly. * * * And now a hurdy gurdy playing that sacred serenade in the alley—and this. It was heinous sacrilege.

"Lord, I can't stand that," he muttered, and turned to the girl a face drawn and white.

"Goodby," he said as if the words choked him.

But the girl's face had whitened also. She took a step forward.

"Robert," she said with wide, frightened eyes.

* * * * * * *

In the alley Pasquale ground away hopelessly. Suddenly a window was raised and a coin dropped at his feet. It was a shining, yellow coin. Pasquale Venetti gasped, turned it over in his palm, and then whooped. In a burst of gratitude he began the repertory all over again, and such was his elation that he essayed to heighten the effect by singing in a high, squeaky voice.

The orgy was soon over, however, for a patrolman came down the alley and seized the exuberant musician. The thought of the yellow coin in his pocket enabled Pasquale to bear this ordeal with equanimity.

"Alla right, alla right!" he protested mildly as he was hustled past the warning signs and dumped unceremoniously on the asphalt pavement.

The Ruling Passion.

The ruling passion is often very strong in death. A senator from Tennessee discovered this some years ago. Among his constituents was a certain man who came to him regularly twice a year for the purpose of obtaining a pass to Baltimore. The man and his family had served the senator when he was first making his way up the ladder of politics, and as a result of this he always obliged him, and had, moreover, a soft place in his heart for the man. He obtained for him a position in one of the departments at Washington; but this did not seem to be enough, for regularly at the end of each six months he applied for his ticket to Baltimore. One day he sickened and was reported to be dying. The senator, very much grieved, immediately called upon him.

"Joe," he said, leaning over and speaking very softly, "is there anything I can do for you?"

The sick man looked up with a flash of recognition, and instantly replied in a whisper:

"Yes, senator; please get me a pass to Baltimore."—Harper's Weekly.

Shipshape on Land.

One of the quaintest charitable institutions in the world is the Royal Alfred Home For Aged Seamen, which houses 100 English mariners in the outskirts of London. It is supported entirely by voluntary contribution. The main idea has been to make the place as homelike as possible, and to this end an effort has been made to preserve in large measure the environment to which the inmates are accustomed.

The dormitories are cut up into tiny cabins, as on shipboard, and in place of the familiar iron cots these veterans of the sea turn in at night in bunks and stow their clothes and other belongings precisely as they would on board ship. Day and night the hours and half hours are struck on a ship's bell in the main hall, and even in the mess room the atmosphere of the sea is retained as an aid to appetite. The house governor is himself an old sea captain of forty years' experience in commanding men, and his rule is entirely along nautical lines.

The Land of Horseradish.

It almost makes the eyes water to read of the village of Balersdorf, in Bavaria, which is celebrated for producing the finest horseradish in Europe. On an area of moist ground, in the valley of the river Regnitz, covering 1,335 acres, that titillating plant is practically the only thing raised, and the annual yield amounts to about 6,000,000 pounds. Horseradish requires a great deal of attention from the cultivator, for in midsummer the soil must be removed from the stems and the side roots rubbed off with a soft cloth, after which the stems are buried again. The plants spring up in March from the end roots, left in the soil the previous autumn, when the upper stems are cut off and packed in barrels for shipment.

Freaks of Lightning.

A noted astronomer and scientist in a recent lecture in Paris gave an account of some of the freaks of lightning. These freaks, however, he affirmed, were determined by causes which we have yet to learn. Sometimes it kills, sometimes it merely injures and sometimes it seems to be frolicking in a way which gives rise to the hypothesis that "it is a thought which, instead of being attached to a brain, is attached to an electric current." Sometimes it plays the physician, as in the instance at Romaines, France, when it struck a man who had not been able to walk without a crutch on account of rheumatism. After the shock the rheumatism disappeared.

It was a narrow alley, running between the back yards. It was intended for the convenience of the butcher's boy and the grocer's boy and the ash man. Distinctively it was not intended for men of Pasquale Venetti's stamp. Indeed, a sign at either end announced this in no uncertain terms.

"Beggars, Peddlers and Street Musicians Keep Out," it read.

But to Pasquale Venetti warning signs in English had no terrors from the simple fact that written English was beyond his ken. Therefore as he came trundling the ancient hurdy gurdy up the street he looked into the alley, saw its possibilities—the ease with which coins could be tossed from the back windows—and, forsaking the asphalt pavements, where, to use his own expression, he could "no getta de biz," he turned into the alley and, unlimbering his musical battery, sent up the quavering strains of "Lindy, Lindy, Yo' Is Ma Ladylove."

It is a hard, cold world. Pasquale ground away patiently, and whenever a face appeared at any of the windows he smiled expansively, removed his battered hat and bowed profoundly and even essayed a joyful shuffling of his feet while he turned the crank. But, despite all these blandishments, to say nothing of the appeal made by a choice assortment of selections, ranging from the classic to ragtime, no coins wrapped in white paper came jingling to his feet. To be sure, one fat cook came out to the back gate and after he had played half through the hurdy gurdy's assortment gave him a penny, and an old gentleman had raised an upper window and, with a thundered "Get out of this!" had flung him a dime. But 11 cents from such a promising alley! Pasquale resented his ill treatment and moved farther up the alley.

No better success attended him here. He whistled, he danced, he sang. He smiled his best and bowed his lowest. He tried the intermezzo and "Ma Filipino Man" with an equal lack of success. He had his labor for his pains.

He moved to the far end of the alley, with a view to quitting it. He made one final stand, however, before the back of an imposing house. With a sinking heart he sent up the jerky bars of a march from a popular light opera. The house, like all the others, was unresponsive. Then he shifted to ragtime. He decided to play through his repertory anyway. If it failed, he would go back to the asphalt pavements and try his luck somewhere downtown before a restaurant or a promising saloon.

SUDDENLY AT HIS FEET WAS A YELLOW COIN.

Now, it happened that in the big, dim back parlor of the imposing house sat two young people, and a single glance showed that they were not happy.

The man sat very stiff and straight in his chair and bit his lips. The girl was seated on a low divan. Her face was flushed and her eyes glowed angrily.

"It is far too much to forgive this time," she was saying. "I have forgiven and forgiven—eternally forgiven—and now I am tired."

The man replied coldly.

"Perhaps you are right," he said in a strained voice.

"And the sooner it's over the better, now," said the girl, choking.

The man started up. Whatever remonstrance he was about to make he stifled.

"Very well," he said curtly.

The girl pulled a ring from her finger and laid it on the table beside the man. He took it without a word and put it in his pocket.

"I might say"—he began slowly.

"All you could say would make no difference," she said wearily.

The man rose and strode to the window. Pasquale was grinding away assiduously. At the sight of the man in the window he snirked and bowed and shuffled his feet. The man smiled bitterly.

"Lucky, happy devil!" he muttered.

Then he turned to the girl and drew himself up stiffly.

"I may as well say goodby," said he.

She made no reply.

"Goodby," he said again.

"Goodby," she returned evenly.

The man hesitated a moment; then he strode to the door. In the alley Pasquale had come to the last piece in his repertory. It was a poor imitation of portions of Schubert's "Serenade." Just as the man reached the door the jingling notes floated in from the alley. The man paused. A look of pain came into his face.

Those jerky notes brought memories with them—memories of a big, dark music room with two little spots of red in the gloom where the candles burned on the piano; of a girl beneath the candles—a girl with white neck and gleaming shoulders, playing the serenade very softly; of a few breathless words whispered over her shoulder; of a pair of luminous eyes which flashed an answer that set his heart pounding madly. * * * And now a hurdy gurdy playing that sacred serenade in the alley—and this. It was heinous sacrilege.

"Lord, I can't stand that," he muttered, and turned to the girl a face drawn and white.

"Goodby," he said as if the words choked him.

But the girl's face had whitened also. She took a step forward.

"Robert," she said with wide, frightened eyes.

* * * * * * *

In the alley Pasquale ground away hopelessly. Suddenly a window was raised and a coin dropped at his feet. It was a shining, yellow coin. Pasquale Venetti gasped, turned it over in his palm, and then whooped. In a burst of gratitude he began the repertory all over again, and such was his elation that he essayed to heighten the effect by singing in a high, squeaky voice.

The orgy was soon over, however, for a patrolman came down the alley and seized the exuberant musician. The thought of the yellow coin in his pocket enabled Pasquale to bear this ordeal with equanimity.

"Alla right, alla right!" he protested mildly as he was hustled past the warning signs and dumped unceremoniously on the asphalt pavement.

The Ruling Passion.

The ruling passion is often very strong in death. A senator from Tennessee discovered this some years ago. Among his constituents was a certain man who came to him regularly twice a year for the purpose of obtaining a pass to Baltimore. The man and his family had served the senator when he was first making his way up the ladder of politics, and as a result of this he always obliged him, and had, moreover, a soft place in his heart for the man. He obtained for him a position in one of the departments at Washington; but this did not seem to be enough, for regularly at the end of each six months he applied for his ticket to Baltimore. One day he sickened and was reported to be dying. The senator, very much grieved, immediately called upon him.

"Joe," he said, leaning over and speaking very softly, "is there anything I can do for you?"

The sick man looked up with a flash of recognition, and instantly replied in a whisper:

"Yes, senator; please get me a pass to Baltimore."—Harper's Weekly.

Shipshape on Land.

One of the quaintest charitable institutions in the world is the Royal Alfred Home For Aged Seamen, which houses 160 English mariners in the outskirts of London. It is supported entirely by voluntary contribution. The main idea has been to make the place as homelike as possible, and to this end an effort has been made to preserve in large measure the environment to which the inmates are accustomed.

The dormitories are cut up into tiny cabins, as on shipboard, and in place of the familiar iron cots these veterans of the sea turn in at night in bunks and stow their clothes and other belongings precisely as they would on board ship. Day and night the hours and half hours are struck on a ship's bell in the main hall, and even in the mess room the atmosphere of the sea is retained as an aid to appetite. The house governor is himself an old sea captain of forty years' experience in commanding men, and his rule is entirely along nautical lines.

The Land of Horseradish.

It almost makes the eyes water to read of the village of Balersdorf, in Bavaria, which is celebrated for producing the finest horseradish in Europe. On an area of moist ground, in the valley of the river Regnitz, covering 1,335 acres, that titillating plant is practically the only thing raised, and the annual yield amounts to about 6,000,000 pounds. Horseradish requires a great deal of attention from the cultivator, for in midsummer the soil must be removed from the stems and the side roots rubbed off with a soft cloth, after which the stems are buried again. The plants spring up in March from the end roots, left in the soil the previous autumn, when the upper stems are cut off and packed in barrels for shipment.

Freaks of Lightning.

A noted astronomer and scientist in a recent lecture in Paris gave an account of some of the freaks of lightning. These freaks, however, he affirmed, were determined by causes which we have yet to learn. Sometimes it kills, sometimes it merely injures and sometimes it seems to be frolicking in a way which gives rise to the hypothesis that "it is a thought which, instead of being attached to a brain, is attached to an electric current." Sometimes it plays the physician, as in the instance at Romaines, France, when it struck a man who had not been able to walk without a crutch on account of rheumatism. After the shock the rheumatism disappeared.

KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS LODGE

Installed In Its New Quarters in First National Bank Building.

The local lodge Knights of Pythias, which is numbered as being one of the strongest lodges of the Maryland jurisdiction, has moved its paraphernalia from Sturgiss' Hall, which has been occupied by the lodge for a long number of years to the large room on the third floor of the First National Bank building on Second and Alder street.

The first meeting of the lodge in its new quarters was held on last Friday evening when a large number of the membership was present and expressed great delight with the change.

Considerable new furniture has been purchased by the lodge which is expected to arrive this week from the manufacturers at Columbus, Ohio, and which will be installed and used in the secret work upon its arrival.

The lodge number more than a hundred members and is steadily growing both in numerical strength and influence.

At the Friday night meeting the following officers were installed for the present term:

Chancellor Commander, Henry Lauer; Vice Chancellor, Dr. Henry W. McComas; Prelate, Charles A. Deffinbaugh; Master at Arms, J. W. Whorton; Master of Work, R. Harry West; trustee, James D. Hamill; Inside Guard, Gene Baumgartner, Outside Guard, F. C. Schroeder.

DIED.

BIGGS—At his home south of Oakland on July 5th, after an illness of several months of pulmonary disease, George S. Biggs, aged about fifty years. He leaves a widow, who was Miss Sarah Haun, daughter of the late William Haun, but no children. His funeral took place from his late home on last Friday.

HARVEY—On Monday at the home of his father, John Wesley Harvey, in District No. 8, of brights disease, Warren Thompson Harvey, aged about 29 years. The deceased was ill but a short time. For six years previous to his death he was employed as bookkeeper of the Wilson and Wildell Lumber Companies. He was taken ill at Wildell and later removed to his home where all that was possible was done to relieve him of his sufferings. The deceased was a most exemplary and religious young man, intelligent and industrious. His funeral took place from his home on Tuesday afternoon, the services being conducting by Revs. E. and Daniel Westfall and I. W. Abernathy with interment on the home farm. To the bereaved parents this paper extends its sincere sympathy.

WEATHER FOR MONTH OF JULY

As Forecasted By the Famous Prophet, Rev. I. R. Hicks.

The Rev. Irl R. Hicks, in his prophecies of July weather predicts much rain and great heat for this month.

He predicted the storms which occurred last week.

The next period of the month will extend from the 12th to the 17th, being central on the 14. "The combination is a strong one," says Rev. Hicks, "and very general, and decided storms will be most natural at this time. Regions where storms have prevailed at the various July periods and except an increase of same during this period while drought and heat will reach a crisis over wide sections intervening. From the 14th to the 17th it will be wise to figure on many violent summer storms. A tendency to continue cloudiness and unsettled weather will follow this period, with a possible rise of the barometer and a change to cooler weather from the 16th to the 19th."

The fourth period of the month will be general on the 20th and 21st. It will be characterized by an increase in the temperature and a storm about the central days. Many places will have storminess, thunder, and lightning and possibly dangerous winds at this and other July periods with but only light and scattering rains.

The fifth storm period will be central on the 25th, extending from the 23rd to the 27th. Early in this period storm conditions will appear and on and touching the 24th and 25th the temperature will rise and there will be a great increase in the tendency to storms followed by a change to somewhat cooler weather from about the 26th to the 29th.

The last period of the month will be central on the 30th and 31st, throwing the culminating crisis over into August. The month will come to a close, however, with high and rising temperature and in the west storms will be forming and starting eastward cross the country.

Liberated Their Companion.

Daniel Cash, a lumberman from Bond, was arrested Sunday night on the charge of being drunk, disorderly and ringing door bells. At the trial before Mayor Davis on Monday, he was assessed $10.40, which included costs, and not having the wherewithal about his person was placed in the tombs until the amount could be made up by his three or four companions. After the crowd had left the vicinity of the Opera House, however, a hammer was procured by his loyal friends and the lock to the cell shattered in such manner that Mr. Cash soon secured his liberty and also retained his $10.40.—Piedmont Herald.

Ex-Senator C. W. Michael of Harford County, Independent Democrat, Discusses the Amendment.

I oppose the adoption of the disfranchising amendment to the Constitution of Maryland—

First—Because I look upon this effort as merely an attempt of the present management of the Democratic party to perpetuate its own existence and power in Maryland, and for no other purpose whatsoever.

Second—Because I look upon this method as a fraudulent attempt to undermine the Constitution of the United States, and that the racial self-defense pleaded in its justification has no foundation in fact.

Third—Because I believe that a tendency exists everywhere in the United States, whenever the interests of the powerful require it, to override constitutional restrictions, which I am fully convinced should receive no encouragement.

Fourth—Because, believing as I do in old-fashioned Democratic principles, I think that the party can be mantained as an agency whereby good government may be effected only when it relies upon its honest men and its honest principles freely accepted by the people, and not upon various kinds of election machinery which is deliberately contrived to thwart their will.

Fifth—Because I believe that whenever the people of Maryland desire to eliminate the illiterate or purchasable vote it should be done in such a manner as to make it certain that the undesirable vote will be eliminated from all political parties alike, and not from one alone to the great advantage of another.

Sixth—Because the right of elective franchise is now guaranteed to the people by the Constitution of the State; and even though in my judgment it is now unfairly and unrighteously administered, yet it is far safer as it is than to have it left in the tender keeping of those who may be both the ignorant and unscrupulous minions of selfish and partisan manipulation.

It has been shown by many persons, and more particularly by Mr. Edgar H. Gans in his communication upon the disfranchising amendment that it is quite possible, in case these amendments are adopted, with the aid of a little legislation, to make the right to vote depend upon the answer one may give to any question that may be asked by the registration officers upon the Constitution of Maryland—or, rather, upon what the registration officers may choose to think about the answer so given, said register being probably as ignorant of Constitutional law as most of the persons seeking to have their names registered. But suppose the registration officer, if you choose, be learned in the law and perfectly honest, and that he should take it into his head to ask the reader to explain the meaning of the following clause, taken from the Bill of Rights, Article 18: "That no law to attain particular persons of treason, or felony, ought to be made in any case, or at any time, hereafter." What would be your answer? Your answer to this question would fix your right to vote. How do you think you would fare? I think it would probably be fair to assume that 90 per cent. of the voting population of Maryland could not explain this article.

Now suppose, as Mr. Gans suggested, that registration officers should ask to have the above clause, or others of equal difficulty, explained by those whom they wished to disfranchise and should ask of those whom they wished to exercise the right of franchise the explanation fo the following—Section 21 of Article 2: "The Governor shall reside at the seat of government, and receive for his services an annual salary of four thousand five hundred dollars," or other very simple section. It is easily seen what great power the registration officers would have to turn the elections to favor their masters—for, after all that we have seen in Maryland, I will not assume, as many affect to assume, that there are no masters in Maryland.

WILL HAVE CHARGE OF CAMP MEETING.

Rev. Joseph Smith Chosen to Succeed Dr E. I. D. Pepper.

Recently the directors of the Mountain Lake Park Association were in receipt of a letter from Dr. E. I. D. Pepper, who has had charge of the camp meetings at the Park ever since the death of Rev. Thompson asking to be relieved of further responsibilities in connection with the annual gathering owing to the condition of his health which has been on the decline for several years. Acting upon the letter as a resignation the board held a meeting on Monday and elected Rev. Joseph Smith, of California, to succeed Dr. Pepper. Dr. Pepper's successor is well qualified in every respect to carry on the meetings successfully and his election to the position will meet with the approbation of all classes.

Mr. E. J. Fringer will conduct the sale.

PROF. M'BEE'S RESIGNATION

As Superintendent of the Oakland Public Schools Has Been Tendered.

Prof. J. Frank McBee, who was principal of the public schools and superintendent of the High School of Oakland during the past year, has tendered his resignation to the board of school trustees, which has been accepted by that body.

Under Prof. McBee's superintendency the schools of Oakland made greater progress during the term just closed than for a great number of years past and his relations with pupils and patrons could not have been more pleasant.

On September 1st he will open a select school in Oakland for young men and young ladies which no doubt will be largely patronized by those desiring the benefits of a higher education.

Flood Damages at Jennings.

Monday afternoon as the result of a severe rain storm in the vicinity of Jennings, this county, considerable damage was done property in that place. Running through the town is a small stream which became a torrent after the rain carrying along on its surface logs, tree tops, etc., which were piled high in front of the hotel there, and washing away outbuildings, walks and flooding the lower portion of the mill.

Shot His Own Hands.

Mr. Bittinger, a farmer living near Avilton, brought his little son, aged about ten years in to Dr. Bullock Wednesday, for treatment. The lad had slipped away with a gun on Saturday and sitting down to rest in the woods on a log, had in some way discharged the weapon, the charge of shot passing through both his hands, which he was resting across the muzzle. Two fingers were shot away on one hand, one had to be amputated on the other and a third considerably damaged.—George Creek Press.

STATISTICS ON HUMAN LONGEVITY

"J. B." Tells of Ripe Old Age Reached By Garrett County Families.

Is longevity hereditary, or does it accompany certain families? Something can be said on both sides of this question. It is proposed to give some cases on these lines.

The first will be Broadwater family. Four brothers, Charles, William, Guy and Samuel, all from Loudon county, Va., settled in old Allegany county about 100 yegrs ago. Charles died in 1859, aged 85 years; William about '65, aged 83; Guy at the age of 82, and Samuel at 75. Amos, son of Charles died about five years ago, aged 94 or 95. William C. another son of Charles is still living at the great age of 93 and is said to be the oldest living man in Garrett county. There are others of the same race, 80 and over, if they could be recalled, with still more on the way, near the line.

The Knepper family of Somerset County, Pa., is called to mind. John Knepper born in 1763 died in 1817, his wife in 1848 aged 84. They had thirteen children, ten sons and three daughters, Elizabeth, a daughter, died at the age of 88; William a son, in 1880 at 80; Lewis in 1888, age 88; Jonathan, once Sheriff, and Judge reached almost 90 years, and lastly Benjamin born in 1816, still living with a wife 88 years old. Six or more of this worthy family have passed the octogenarian mark. B. Knepper is a Reformed minister, and there are but few if any who have performed the many functions of the minister longer and oftener than he. There is at least one living couple he bound in the holy bonds not less than 56 years ago. He still officiates occasionally.

Another ancient family in the opposite direction is cited. Jesse Tomlinson died in December, 1840, at the age 87 years, at the Little Meadows now Garrett County. His wife died the next February, 1841, aged 84. They had eight children, five sons and three daughters. All the sons died while the parents were living—none of them over 40 years. William in Kentucky, time and age not exactly known, Josephine 1824, age 38; Dr. Basil Tomlinson, age and time of death not exactly kuown; John L., in 1832 age 29; and Henry B., a member of the Allegany Bar in 1838 age 38. Sarah Sides, a daughter died in 1836 aged 51, Rachel, wife of George Bruce in 1842, age 53; and Rebecca, wife of Issac Beall in 1847, 64 years old. She was the last of this historic family and the Jesse Tomlinson family has been extinct ever since the death of himself and wife.

BITTINGER.

The celebration at this place on Independence Day was a pleasant occasion and was very liberally attended by our people and those from near-by places. The exercises were in charge of Rev. Shoup, the star speaker of the day being Hon. W. H. Ruple, of Somerset, Pa. The day's program consisted of patriotic music, a poetical recital and the reading of the Declaration of Independence. The picnicers were quiet and orderly and the pleasure of the day was unmarred by any boisterous revelry or unpleasant incident.

Miss Ethel Kitsmiller, of Oakland, is visiting Mrs. Daisy Lohr this week.

Miss Mary Wiley, of Moscow, Md., is spending this week with relatives at this place.

Mr. Young Lohr, of Oakland, is passing a few days with his friends in this section.

Mr. Turney, of Friendsville, was in town last week introducing a rheumatic cure.

Mr. G. W. Engle returned to Baltimore last Monday, after spending a week with his family here.

A terrific electrical storm passed over this section last Friday afternoon, during which the inmates of Joel Orendorff's home were slightly shocked by a bolt of lightning.

The farmers of this section are harvesting their wheat this week and an extra yield is expected.

A Poem for Today

WE HAVE BEEN FRIENDS

By Caroline E. Norton

"THIS lady," says one critic of Mrs. Norton's poems, "is the Byron of our modern poetesses. She has very much of that intense personal passion by which Byron's poetry is distinguished from the larger grasp and deeper communion with man and nature of Wordsworth. She has also Byron's beautiful intervals of tenderness, his strong, practical thought and his forceful expression." Mrs. Norton, who was a granddaughter of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, the dramatist, was born in 1808 and died in 1877. Her best known poem is "Bingen on the Rhine."

WE have been friends together
In sunshine and in shade,
Since first beneath the chestnut-tree
In infancy we played.
But coldness dwells within my heart,
A cloud is on thy brow:
We have been friends together;
Shall a light word part us now?

We have been gay together;
We have laughed at little jests;
For the fount of hope was gushing
Warm and joyous in our breasts.
But laughter now hath fled thy lip,
And sullen glooms thy brow;
We have been gay together,
Shall a light word part us now?

We have been sad together;
We have wept with bitter tears
O'er the grass-grown graves where slumbered
The hopes of early years.
The voices which were silent there
Would bid thee clear thy brow:
We have been sad together,
Shall a light word part us now?

SKETCH OF THE CUSTER FAMILY

Descended From Old Virginian Ancestry.

NUMEROUS IN GARRETT COUNTY.

Extinct In Allegany—Not a Warlike Race—Amiable, Peaceful and Most Highly Respectable—The Hero of the Family a Great Soldier.

I have a number of times recently been called on for information in regard to the Custer family, which has of late years become not only noted but historic on account of the chief of the family, Gen. George A. Custer, a distinguished young cavalry officer in our civil war. He stepped from Westpoint as a graduate with honors in 1861, into the war in which he was engaged for its entire duration. Many yet vividly remember his tragic death in 1876 at the Little Big Horn, by Sitting Bull and his savage warriors. His career though not lengthy was brilliant, patriotic and national, worthy of proud recollections and national gratitude as well as a prominent place in the history of our nation.

A number of inaccuracies have appeared in the general scope of the publications. Perhaps the author of this paper has more personal knowledge of the Custer family at large than anyone else living. A sketch of the Custer family is to be found in "Brown's Miscellaneous Writings." This sketch was written in 1887, and the facts mainly gotten from Emanuel Custer, father of Gen. Custer, when on his last visit to his old home county.

The Custer race hails from Old Virginia. Two brothers, John and Emanuel, left their homes in the valley something over 100 years ago. John settled at Cresaptown in this county. He was a blacksmith and hotel keeper by vocation. His wife was a Garlitz, sister of old Christian Garlitz, the noted old time hunter of Allegany county. The old time Garlitz also came from Virginia with its ways and style of language. John Custer had a family of children, most of whom went to what is now West Virginia. He died somewhat mysteriously in 1830. His son, Emanuel, left home when 19 years of age and went to Harrison county, Ohio, with all his belongings bound up in a bandana handkerchief. He, like his father, was a blacksmith, and followed his trade for many years. Left his county and went to Wood county in the same state, and from thence to Monroe, Michigan, where he lived for the rest of his life, and died a number of years ago. He was married twice, both times to Ohio ladies. The General was a son of the second wife.

It is not remembered how many children Mary Custer had, but at least an ordinary-sized family. Two sons, a son-in-law, and a grandson, all were slaughtered at the great massacre at the Little Big Horn. Among the slain was Capt. George Yates a promising officer of the U. S. Army. His wife was a sister of Mr. Milnor Roberts, of this city, he being connected with the prominent Humbird family of Cumberland. Emanuel Custer made but two visits to his old home, after leaving it in 1824. The first eight years later, and the other as already stated. The writer of this enjoyed the pleasure of several calls made by him. He was found to be a man of intelligence, character and and sound principles in every respect; with an amiable, quiet and gentlemanly nature; to all of which were added traits of a professing Christian, modest in his demeanor, never mentioned the name of his distinguished son except when called for. Of course he had a just pride in his sacrificed children as well as deep sorrows, but it was a sore subject to him for conversation. The glory attached to their names did not relieve the agony he endured on account of their tragic end.

The great war secretary, Stanton, was a warm friend of Emanuel Custer. They were old Ohio acquaintances. More than once during the great war when a wayward soldier would fall into trouble, Emanuel would help him by appealing to the great secretary, who would say familiarly: "Well, Emanuel, what must I do now." But he was too true and too loyal to ask for anything improper, or hurtful, to the cause. All the Cresaptown Custers have long since departed from that place. The name is extinct within the limits of Allegany county, but quite numerous in the junior county of Garrett.

In this connection something can and ought to be appropriately said about the family of old Emanuel Custer, brother of John, and uncle of Emanuel, already mentioned. This family has no historic character in it, but its many descendents are worthy citizens and deserving of respect.

Emanuel Custer, uncle to the father of General Custer, settled upon an ancient tract of land called Mount Nebo in what is now Garrett county. He died in 1829, after a peaceful and respectable life. He left a widow and 8 sons: Adam, Jacob, Daniel, John, David, Samuel, Peter and Jeremiah, all good old bible names, and Catharine, an only daughter, all long since dead. Jacob died suddenly in a harvest field from a sun stroke.

Samuel, the last survivor, died on the old home farm some years ago, which is still in the occupancy of some of the family. Daniel met with a tragic death about 1832. He and his new wife were riding down a mountain slope in a sleigh at a high rate of speed, when the rig overturned and threw him with such violence against a tree as to crush his brains. Death came instantly. In a short while came a postumous child, yet living in her seventies. The sorrowing mother lived till a few years ago in her widowhood, which lasted 65 years. Where if there a parallel case? I know of none. The nearest is Mrs. Dr. J. H. Patterson, now of Oakland, California. Her loneliness has lasted since January, 1852, now 85 years of age. All this large brotherhood were married except three, and left many children and descendants, all or nearly all of Garrett county, and remarkable for quietude obedience to law and of good citizenship. The Custer race of that county is not going to fade away as the other branch has done in Allegany. The wonder of some is where Gen. Geo. A. Custer got his military genius and fighting qualities. When it is known the race was and is such an amiable, quiet and peaceful one. Perhaps from the Ohio mother with a sprinkle of the old Garlitz blood in the grandmother. J. B.

DARK CANON PIONEER.

Walter F. Thayer, An Old Cowman of Eddy County.

A recent copy of the New Mexico Sun, published at Carlsbad, New Mexico, contained a descriptive article of Walter F. Thayer's career since he went west. He is a brother of Mr. Fred. A. Thayer and Mesdames Johnson and Waters, of Oakland. Mr. Thayer left Oakland shortly after the close of the Civil War, first settling in Texas, later going to New Mexico, where he has become one of the cattle kings of that country. The Sun's article follows:

Walter Thayer, the Dark canon stockman, came to New Mexico from Maverick Co., Texas, in 1878 and immediately secured employment with John Chisum, the then cattle king of this section. This was at the breaking out of the Lincoln county war and at the time that Billy the Kid had sworn vengeance against John Chisum and all his friends, because he claimed that Chisum owed him money for work.

Mr. Thayer was sent, by Chisum, to Arizona, with a drove of cattle. This was in 1878 in the fall. He returned during the winter and in the spring of 1879 he was sent to Canadian, Texas, with 7000 cows and calves. James Chisum having charge of the outfit returning in the fall. When he returned in the fall 1879, though the Kid was still out, the Lincoln county war had ended. The fall of 1880, Mr. Thayer went to work for Henry L. Van Wyck, at Bosque Grande.

After working one winter Mr. Thayer helped move the cattle down from Bosque Grande to a point just about where the Avalon dam is now. While driving the cattle down the spring of 1880, the indians stole all the saddle horses and work mules, except three head of saddle horses which were tied to rustle the stock on. A messenger was sent over to Seven rivers where mounts were obtained for the party and the trail of the indians struck. Mr. Thayer only remembers the names of seven out of ten of the party who struck out after the indians. They were Messrs. Van Wyck, Joe Nash, Buck Powell, Tom Walker, Jno. Edwards, W. Thayer and Fred Alberdine. They pursued the theiving indians in a southeasterly course for thirty hours when from lack of water they were compelled to quit the trail, which had been followed by moon light, as well as by day light, until the horses were nearly dead for water. Some distance after leaving the trail Tom Walker's horse died and Tom got on behind Thayer. Two other horses died shortly after, but by doubling up and leaving the saddles the party reached Pecos, at Pierce canon, about day light next morning, having traveled in hot weather for forty eight hours, through sand without water. The posse had traveled through an unknow country, at that time seldom if ever visited by white man. After arriving at Pierce canon they threw in with M. L. Pierce and rested up for two or three days. In about ten days came in to Pierce's ranch and stole him out. He then went to Ft. Davit and got some thirty soldiers who came up the Pedos and took the trail of the andians

After the soldiers had followed the trail around from Pierce canon to Five Wells, Four Lakes and Mescelaro Springs over on the east side, the trail crossed the Pecos at the mouth of the Felix, Thayer and Walker joined the party of soldiers at this point, with whom Joe Nash and M. L. Pierce had accompanied from Pierce canon. The whole party went up to the Mescelaro reservation and found all the stock, recovering every head, about sixty saddle horses and work mules. Though the saddle horses were poor and their backs tore up, they all recruited in a few months.

Mr. Thayer continued to work for Van Wyck until the summer of 1882.

December 22 and 23 1881, a party of Indians came down from the reservation and stole Mr. Ashby's horses from near the head of Rocky arroya. A party was immediately organized to follow them consisting of Pete Corn, Mart Fanning, Mr. Ashby and son, Mr. Eubank, Alberdine, Jim Whitaker, Jno. Edwards, Cal Oats and Mr. Thayer. They struck the trail on Rocky and followed it up Last Chance to the rim rock and into the head of Dark canon, where they found the indians. The old man Ashby divided his squad in three parties, sending Corn and Thayer to the right, two more to the left and four followed up the ridge.

After getting close to the indians, they opened fire, the whole squad getting together and shooting at the indians. After fifty or sixty shots, the whites changed location and kept up the battle for a couple of hours. They finally dislodged the indians and captured six horses, returning home. Mr. Ashby afterward got most of his horses, up at the reservation.

That season he opened up what is known as the old Barber place, on Rocky, ranching there two or three years and sold out to Gordon Bros.

In 1885 he took up what is now the Sam Jones ranch and in 1888 he was married to Miss Olie Shattuck, daughter of Capt. Shattuck.

Sometime in 1898, Mr. Thayer purchased from F. E. Downs the beautiful ranch upon which he now resides, about forty five miles from town, up in Dark cabin. This is one of the most elegant homes in Eddy county with forty-five or fifty acres irrigated from a sparkling stream of mountain water, issuing from a big spring, up in Dark canon. His irrigated land is divided in fruit, alfalfa, garden and grain.

His twelve acre orchard is one of the finest in the west, the apples being the finest brought to Carlsbad. He has also engaged to some extent in growing fine stock of which he has quite a number of Herefords and Red Polls.

Way back, sometime in the early days, Mr. Thayer started the X brand, of which brand a man cannot get out of sight of, anywhere on the west side between the head of Black river and the drift fence above Seven rivers.

The Suffering Savior.

The anonymous manner in which the subject of this poem is introduced is one of the surprises of literature. The skill of it challenges admiration. The hero lives and moves, but is nameless. His career of paradoxes, with its alternations of shame and honor, grief and joy, is depicted to its very close, where the so-called malefactor has a king's grave; but his name is not once announced.

Another striking characteristic of the poem is, that is is written in praise of an idea superlatively repugnant to the Oriental mind. The East can never divorce suffering from shame. To it affliction is always penal. Woe is disgraceful. It seems absurd to suggest any possible advantage as accruing to it. Yet the first stanza flatly controverts this current sentiment, and affirms the honor and usefulness of suffering.

The portraiture of the Sufferer follows: It is done with minute and persistent fidelity. One dark stroke after another is laid on. The vistage is so marred that it is fairly dehumanized. He is no tall and stately palm, but a thin and frail plant; or worse, a root lying on the parched earth. No form! no comeliness! No regal state or retinue which would command respect. Man of Sorrows; not casually acquainted, but on intimate terms with suffering. He is the personification of grief. Sorrows and afflictions are concreted in Him. Under pretense of legal form He is cut off without natural descendant and in prime of life. They attempted to make a grave for Him with executed criminals.

Literature does not contain another such likeness of the Sufferer. But the delineation of the human attitude towards the Sufferer is equally faithful. Is it to be wondered that a character which so contravened all current notions of greatness, and even goodness, should have been despised and rejected; that the face should be averted from such an one—and that the concensus should be that He was smitten of God for a cause.

At this point the prophet enters a strong disclaimer to the current and habitual judgment of the East, "This Sufferer was not stricken for His own sins." An idea, bran-new in Oriental thought, is now evolved; namely, the vicarious nature of suffering. "No, He was pierced for our transgressions. He was crushed to death for our iniquities. We get our peace with God by His chastening, and our wounds are healed by His scourging." He was ill-treated and scoffed while He bowed Himself in voluntary pain. He came to suffer, and so will remain dumb before His unjust judges and foresworn accusers.

The triumph of suffering is the last touch upon this marvelous picture. All the thinking of the East is to be turned back in its course. Suffering is not defeated, but the contrary. It is the way to glory. He who treads it shall divide a portion with the great. Weakness shall divide with the strong.

The Teacher's Lantern.

Suffering is the crux of life. Whence came it? What is its' utility? When and how will it end? The problem seems peculiarly unsolvable to the Oriental mind.

* * * * *

The life of the Supreme Sufferer gave the lie to current philosophy, which affirmed the disgrace and inutility of suffering.

* * * * *

Though faith is so laggard that the prophet must needs cry: "Who, if any one, has believed our report?" "Who sees the arm of God in it?" Yet suffering is both useful and honorable.

* * * * *

The prophet diognoses the case. It is the most superb psychological analysis in literature. First he pictures the bewilderment of the people at the servants' suffering. He gives their hasty conclusion; namely, that it is all contemptible. Passing into the equity of the case, they reason that the Sufferer is bearing a penalty. But on further examination its vicarious quality and its redemptive effect is discovered. And this conclusion is reached by a subjective process, not by a categorical Divine declaration. The human conscience is touched by what is sees, and makes penitent announcement.

* * * * *

The face of Jesus shines through the veil of the prophet's language, though he does not once mention His name or indicate His rank.

* * * * *

The prophet sits at the very foot of the cross while he paints this fadeless portrait of the Sufferer.

* * * * *

Before Isaiah could have uttered words which contain the very heart of the gospel and win for him the title of Evangelist among the prophets, some unusual experience must have prepared him.

* * * * *

The sixth chapter contains a vivid and sublime description of this preparatory experience.

* * * * *

This vision of God produce the natural effect, a consciousness of sin. The prophet cries: "Woe is me. I am undone, because of my unclean lips." The symbolism of touching the lips with fire is explained in the announcement, "Thine iniquity is taken away."

* * * * *

One act remains. That ineffable voice is heard, calling not now for an angelic messenger, but for a human evangel, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for me." The prophet, elevated by what he has witnessed, and prepared by that to which he has submitted, exclaims, "Here am I! Send me!"

The Man Who Makes
A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould to the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

A Flight From Care

By HOWARD FIELDING

Copyright, 1904, by Charles W. Hooke

THE dearest girl in the world and her mother came into the city on a Tuesday and very obligingly looked me up in my office about noon. They were so kind as to notice that I was not quite at my best and to express their sympathy.

It was true that I had been overworking for a month or more, that my hand was unsteady and that there were dark crescents under my eyes as a result of strenuous devotion to business extending into the midnight hours. In fact, my attempt to make the most of a streak of good luck had been so violent that I was on the verge of collapse. But I made light of it to the aforementioned young lady and her mother.

Mrs. Stanwood regarded me with an almost maternal solicitude.

"I was thinking that you might come out and stay with us over Sunday," responded Mrs. Stanwood. "You know we shall have Cousin Jim's house all to ourselves"—

It was all settled in a moment. A sweet decisiveness is one of Margaret's thousand charms, and upon this occasion, as often before and since, she saved me the trouble of making up my mind. Of course I knew that I ought not to accept this invitation, and of course I forgot an important business engagement which I had sinfully made for Sunday afternoon.

I had all kinds of trouble changing that appointment, but managed to do it without other loss than that which is measured in nerve force.

Margaret was waiting for me at the station in a hired equipage, and she urged the driver of the ancient nag to make all possible haste.

"Your train's a little late," said she to me in explanation, "and I promised Uncle Henry that I would come back as soon as I could."

Uncle Henry is Mrs. Stanwood's brother. He is a man whose fortunes had been declining of late, and he had been reduced to the necessity of taking boarders. Mrs. Stanwood and Margaret had spent a couple of months in his house, partly as a measure of economy and partly to help him along. Uncle Henry's son, James, is married and has a home of his own in Springvale, and I had understood that he and his family were to be away and that Margaret and her mother were to take care of the house. It would have suited me much better to be entertained at Cousin Jim's in that gentleman's absence, because there were too many people at Uncle Henry's to suit the inclinations of a nervous man who has planned to spend a quiet Sunday with his fiancee. Nevertheless I asked as cheerfully as possible if we were going to Uncle Henry's.

"Oh, no," replied Margaret. "Uncle Henry is at Cousin Jim's with mamma. She felt a little nervous there with no man about except Robert, who isn't of the smallest use as a protector, of course."

IT WAS ALL SETTLED IN A MOMENT.

"Who is Robert, if I may venture to inquire?"

"He's Cousin Jim's hired man. He sleeps in the garret, and all the rest of the house might be carried off without his knowing it. He's"—

"Your mam ain't the only one that's worrited these nights," interrupted the venerable driver, looking over his shoulder. "My wife gits up an' lights a light every time one o' our caows turns over in her stall in the barn, though the Lord knows we ain't got nothin' in our house that a burgular 'd pick up if 'twas lyin' in the middle o' the road."

"Burglars?" said I, amazed. "Do you have that sort of gentry out here?"

"You bet we've had more of 'em than we wanted lately," responded the driver. "There's three other houses be'n broken into besides Mullett's."

"I should never think of being afraid," said the dearest girl, "but mamma has been quite nervous. At Uncle Henry's she has barricaded her door every night this week with all the furniture in the room."

"What is there to steal at Cousin Jim's?" I asked. And she replied that there was nothing at all, so far as she knew, whereupon I assured her that no better guarantee of safety could be desired, for serious minded burglars never entered a house containing nothing of value.

"I wish you'd come round an' tell that to my wife," said the driver. "She makes me sleep with a loaded shotgun standin' ag'in the head o' the bed, an' then she's so derned scared for fear the gun 'll go off that she sets up all night to watch it."

At this he struck his infirm steed a spiteful blow, and the creature ambled along with the gait of a toy horse carved from a single piece of wood until we came to Cousin Jim's house, which was the last on the street. Beyond was a large vacant corner lot and then a highway scantily adorned with residences. As a mark for midnight marauders Cousin Jim's domicile was well set, and I said so jocularly to the driver while presenting him with a small token of my esteem.

"You're right," said he, pocketing my coin, and then he added in a low voice, "There's stuff in that house that the young lady don't know about—stuff that's worth stealin'."

"What stuff?" said I. But he shook his head as he climbed into the wagon.

"I dunno nothin' pers'nally," said he. "I only know what folks say. Get up, Calamity!"

The well named steed moved off, and I turned toward the house. There was a dim light in the hall, and a brighter glow shone from some windows in the second story. Margaret was leaning out from the railing of the veranda and calling to her mother to come down and unlock the screen door. I paused upon the walk and for the first time became fully aware of the singular oppressiveness of the night. The air was utterly stagnant; but, looking aloft, I saw a scurrying mass of little clouds like disordered troops in retreat.

As I lowered my eyes there came a prolonged flash of lightning, like a series of winks, and by this illumination I saw the figure of a man crouching behind a bush at the far corner of the house. In my ordinary state of nerves this would not have startled me. The man's presence might have a simple explanation, and, even though he were there upon dishonest business, he might easily be frightened off.

Before I could decide what to do Mrs. Stanwood and Uncle Henry appeared at the door. I picked up my satchel from the walk and hurried forward. In a tremulous voice Mrs. Stanwood expressed her pleasure at my coming, and she introduced me to Uncle Henry, a hesitating man who seemed always to be afraid that he had forgotten something.

"I must be going," said he at the earliest possible moment. "The folks at home will be anxious."

He stood a moment rubbing his chin dubiously and then bade us good night and wandered away, shaking his head. I was shown to my room, and after removing the stains of travel I joined the ladies in the sitting room on the second floor.

They seemed to be struggling with some vague alarm.

"Mamma thinks she heard a noise down in the kitchen," said Margaret in explanation.

"Show me that noise," said I, taking the pose of a stage hero, "and I will beat its brains out."

"The kitchen is at the far end of the hall," responded Mrs. Stanwood. "This little house is built on straight lines. When all the doors are open, you can stand in the front vestibule and see the big tree in the back yard through the kitchen window. Still there's no real need of your going down there."

The last sentence was so obviously insincere that I gave it no heed. I began to descend the stairs.

"You might make sure that the front door is locked," called Mrs. Stanwood.

This suited me precisely, for what I chiefly desired was to get a look outside. Therefore I opened the inner glass paneled door of the vestibule with the intention of going out upon the veranda and came face to face with a squarely built, grim visaged man, roughly dressed and wearing a cap.

It was an even chance in the first instant whether I should faint away or leap at the villain's throat, and then I bethought me that he must be Robert, the manservant.

"Robert," I said in a low voice, "was it you whom I saw at the corner of the house a few minutes ago?"

He stared at me a moment, then shook his head and passed on into the house without a word.

I stepped outside and walked from end to end of the veranda and looked along the sides of the house; but, although I was favored by several flashes from the heavens, I saw nothing of the lurking marauder. I re-entered the house, locking the inner and outer doors, and then walked straight rearward to the kitchen.

Mrs. Stanwood had told me that she had locked all the doors on the lower floor, but I found that which was between the hall and the kitchen unfastened. The key was hanging down from the lock as if it had been cautiously pushed back in order that a skeleton key might be inserted from the other side.

I hesitated a moment, listening, and then struck a match and stepped into the room. If a burglar had confronted me at that moment I should not have had the strength to bid him good evening. But the kitchen was empty. Directly opposite me was the window; at my left, a door that I knew, from the design of the house, must open upon the cellar stairs. Mechanically I turned the key. Then, still thinking of the man whom I had seen, I crossed to the window, raised the shade and peered out into the darkness. Almost immediately a flash of lightning illumined the yard. In the blue gleam I saw the trunk of the big tree and beyond it a fence. The tree trunk hid the body of a man who was leaning over the fence, but I saw his right arm and his hand. He was holding a large revolver. I saw the weapon perfectly plainly.

I turned back toward the hall and stood irresolute, trying to form a plan which would fit a state of things so exceptional. The thunder following the flash had ceased. The house was very still, so still that I clearly heard the cellar stairs creak under the slow tread of a man ascending. While I waited, breathless, the knob of the door turned in his hand. He tried it many times, and yet I had not the strength to move or speak.

The door began to strain and groan. The man upon the other side had put his weight against it. I stepped forward and spoke in a low voice, but so close that he must hear me.

"I am going to shoot through that door!" said I.

The man did not reply, nor did he desist from his endeavor to force the door. His dull, silent, stolid courage amazed and awed me. Clearly he must know that I was in some sort of trap. Perhaps in a moment the fellow's partner would thrust his revolver through the window and order me to hold up my hands. Yet nothing prevented my retreat toward the other part of the house. Surely they must know that.

I turned toward the hall and saw through the glass of the inner door a man in the front vestibule. I was trapped as neatly as the Mulletts had been in their cellar.

"Margaret," I called, "I'm afraid there's something wrong down here. You and your mother had better lock the sitting room doors!"

A stifled scream from Mrs. Stanwood answered this announcement. Margaret cried out:

"Come up here! I'll get Robert!"

"Get him, by all means," I replied. "But I'll stay here."

There was a long knife on the table. I took it and stood ready by the cellar door. It was nearly impossible that the man who was trying to force it should ever come through and live. This thought cheered me. It was a taste of triumph.

As I waited and the door creaked there came a metallic tapping on the window. Undoubtedly the man outside could shoot me if he chose, but I did not believe that he would risk making so much noise.

Then the vestibule door opened. I had almost forgotten my enemy upon that side. At the same moment Margaret called out from the upper regions of the house:

"Robert is not here! I can't find him!"

"What's the matter?" said a slow, dubious and familiar voice.

It was Uncle Henry, who had entered by the front door.

"I've got a telegram for Margaret," said he. "What's the trouble here?"

I beckoned to him and at the same time called to Mrs. Stanwood:

"Don't be alarmed. We're all right now."

Uncle Henry came into the kitchen, and I whispered to him, "There's a burglar in the cellar and another in the back yard."

"Well, well!" said Uncle Henry and glanced toward the window in alarm, which changed to obvious relief. He crossed to the door opening from the kitchen to the yard and admitted a uniformed policeman with a revolver in his hand.

"I thought I saw somebody hanging around the house," said the officer, "and as there's so much talk of burglars just now I"—

"We think he may have got into the cellar," said Uncle Henry.

The policeman looked at the cellar door, which began to groan and strain.

"That's mighty queer," said he and turned the key.

Instantly the door opened, and Robert, the servant, plunged headlong into the room. He recovered his balance and stared at us.

"For the love of heaven," I exclaimed, "why didn't you answer me when I spoke to you through the door?"

Robert shook his head.

"He couldn't," said Uncle Henry, with a smile. "He's deaf and dumb." And he began to wag his fingers at Robert. "He says," continued Uncle Henry, "that he went down cellar to get a little piece of ice out of the icebox, and somebody locked the door."

"Ask if it's him that's been walking around back of the house this evening," said the policeman.

Uncle Henry wagged his fingers some more and then said, "Yes."

RUSSIA'S INTERNAL WOES.

Russia, from the reports, seems to be a mighty boiling caldron, bubbling over first at one point, then at another, and sometimes at nearly all points. The fact that the censorship is actively enforced gives an ominous coloring to these reports. Even so startling an event as the mutiny in the Black Sea fleet did not become fully known in St. Petersburg until forty-eight hours after it had happened. It is natural, therefore, to assume that the situation is much worse than is imagined. The whole country is in the throes of revolution. People are speaking in bodies and as individuas they dared not speak six month ago, and the impulse of resistance is traveling from province to province and from one subject to another. The significant thing is that if this continues much longer this revolutionary spirit will blend into union and action which no amount of administrative effort will be able to control.

It is not surprising, therefore, that a conspiracy is reported amongst the autocrats to dethrone the Czar. The probability of such a conspiracy suggested the rumor. It is not likely that men engaged in such an enterprise would make their purposes known. The weakness of the Czar is charged with the progress of the revolution. This is not a necessary inference. The vigor of the Czar on the 22d of January precipitated the present situation. The Russians have never been the same since the massacre. The troops, especially the Cossacks, have been often interposed since then, always with increased hatred for the autocracy and the spread of the revolutionary sentiment.

A strong man—that is, a brute like Sergius—might kill more people, and he might even conquer for the moments the wills of the Russians, but the spirit of revolution would go marching on. The loyalty to the Czar, that sentiment without which no government can long maintain itself, is gone forever.

Were the Czar superseded by a more brutal kinsman he would simply pave the way for some ambitious military man. It is strange that one has not already come to the front. But the most ambitious soldiers are in Manchuria. Those at home are dregs left from the straining. If there is anything in the peace negotiations the war must come to an end in a few months, and some of these soldiers who have not gathered many laurals in the East will be ripe for work at home. It is entirely possible that the autocracy will have to reckon with some of these man. It may easily occur to them that it is honorable, as well as more profitable, to float with the rising tide than to follow the precarious fortunes of a dying dynasty.

HOYES.

Messrs. Hoye, Cormany and Friend, of Deer Park, passed through our town last Wednesday enroute to Friendsville.

Most all the young folks in our neighborhood spent the 4th picnicing. Some were at Oakland and quite a number at Accident.

WHICH WILL YOU HAVE?

The State Normal School Diploma or the County Superintendent's Certificate.

The following paper, prepared by Miss Mary Fawcett Carscaden, of Cumberland, one of the recent graduates of the Frostburg Normal School was read at the graduation exercises of that institution and published in the Frostburg Journal of last week. It may be of interest to those teachers of this county who desire to qualify themselves in the best possib'e manner for the position of teacher:

"In our State there are two ways in which a prospective teacher may become qualified to teach. She may register at either of the two Normal Schools—at Baltimore or at Frostburg, and after completing the course of study there prescribed in a satisfactory manner, receive a diploma which entitles her to teach anywhere in the State.

If, however, she does not elect to spend the four years necessary to complete the Normal courses she may take an examination from the County Examiner, and having made a certain percentage, he gives a certificate good for one year.

Thus she may become a teacher in either of these two ways.

The question naturally comes up—"Which of these ways should be adopted if it were desired to make either universal?"

And the answer comes also as a matter of course—"The one which better fits the teacher for the place which she is to occupy."

In childhood the mind is plastic and easily impressed—the character is easily moulded, and lessons may be taught there with deep meaning. The responsibility of dealing with child nature is a sacred task. "To fix the generous purpose in the glowing breast" is a labor not to be taken up without thought and preparation for the work. A mistaken teacher may deaden those finer sensibilities it should be her purpose to train while a skillful teacher—one thoroughly prepared for her mission, will be able to do untold good. The rearing of these tender branches should no more be entrusted to unskilled hands than a gardener should consign to an ignorant apprentice boy the care and cultivation of rare and delicate flowers.

In the Normal School the student is required to study the science of the minds of those she is to teach—Phychology. She studies the history of education, the different educational theories advanced, methods in education, and teaching in all its numerous phases. She approaches her specialty from all sides and made thoroughly acquainted with definite method and class management. She not only studies the theories, however, but is given the opportunity of demonstrating their application in the Model School. In the Frostburg Normal she not only observes and notes the method of conducting a recitation, but she is herself required to teach.

Besides the study of educational methods, she is taught all the subjects she will be expected to teach and she is taught how to present them. The Normal Schools seek to give—not only a reciting knowledge, but a teaching knowledge of the branches taken up. Here is the chief advantage over the holder of the superintendent's certificate.

At best, the average candidate at the county examination is a High School graduate with a good academic education. She has been taught, but not taught how to teach. She forms her own laws, her own methods without any regard for the logical procedure upon a psychological basis. Perhaps her methods are good, but it is a game of chance, and without a knowledge of psychology the novice is apt to fail and fail often. Experience does not count for much unless it be experience along the right lines. The average high school graduate forms her own laws for imparting knowledge and continues in pursuance of them.

This is the result for the better class of candidates. There are others who have scarcely completed the grades they expect to teach, but who, by a lucky chance, have contrived to make the required percentage. A holder of a second grade certificate known to me invariably spells the word, "until," with two l's, and writes initials of the days of the week in small letters. Yet, because she made a certain percentage she is given the privilege of imparting the above facts(?) to some twenty five children.

There is no doubt that this is not true in all cases. There are "born teachers" who seem to know intuitively the workings of the child-mind, and who have only taken the county examination.

The safer side, however, is to have a normal education, which makes such mistakes as those given above very improbable.

The normal graduates are given preference to some degree now, and the time will come when the preference will be most decided, and education at a Normal School will be essential to admission to the teacher's office The superintendent's examination, however broad its scope, is not a good final test as to the teaching ability of the examined.

Mr. D. E. Offutt Jr., returned from Philadelphia last Sunday night where he had been for a week examining into the merits of various makes of automobiles. He purchased an Autocar and its arrival is expected here today.

Playford Hinebaugh, son of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Hinebaugh, of near Oakland, who has been at his home owing to the extremely critical illness of his mother, left Tuesday afternoon for Hambleton, W. On another page of this paper today will be found on article from the pen of Mr. Jacob Brown, of Cumberland, dealing with the Custer family this county of which Gen. George A. Custer, killed in battle between the Federal soldiers and Sitting Bull on the Little Big Horn, was a member. The article is well written, as all of Mr. Brown's articles are, and is intensely interesting to those who have any connection or acquaintance with the Custer family, many members of which are still Garrett countians and counted among our best citizens.

Some merchants excuse the obvious shortcomings in their advertisements by the plea that they didn't "have time to get up a good ad." The additional leisure that comes with a lull in business could be employed in no better way that in the study of all phases of advertising, in collecting and arranging of ideas and suggestions, and in planning of profitable means of getting to the public ear and understanding.

Dr. Charles Beachy, of Grantsville, who was here and at the Park attending the camp meeting which closed Monday night, was a very pleasant caller at this office yesterday afternoon. Dr. Beachy has forsaken his profession for the ministry and is preparing himself to enter actively in work for the salvation of souls. He has the well wishes of many friends in Oakland for his success in the laudable undertaking before him. He is an entertaining talker, and his labors no doubt will be crowned with great success.

BARN STRUCK BY LIGHTNING

Last Thursday Afternoon During the Storm Then Prevailing.

The large and recently remodeled barn belonging to Mr. "Duke" McLean, located near McHenry, was struck by lightning at two points during the terrific rain and electrical storm which passed over that section of the county last Thursday afternoon between four and five o'clock.

Mr. McLean was in the barn at the time the bolts struck, one entering at each end of the roof at the gables, tearing off the shingles and rafters and setting the structure on fire. Luckily the owner was not stunned and seeing that the flames were gaining headway he ran into the barnyard where a well is located and pumped water with which he extinguished the fire.

One horse was in the barn which was stunned very severely by the stroke and for several hours lay as though paralyzed.

Mr. McLean's loss is fully covered by insurance.

Lands at Auction.

Mr. Cornelius W. Friend, as agent for the Yough Manor Land company, will offer at public auction in front of the Crawford Hotel at Friendsville on Saturday, August 26th, two large tracts of land belonging to the company he represents. The land will be sold in lots of one hundred to two hundred acres. See advertisement in this paper for full particulars.

Prof. Ed. A Browning, superintendent of the public school system of Garrett county, left Oakland last Sunday afternoon for the Blue Mountain House where he attended the sessions of the Maryland Teachers' Association there during the week, and leaving thence for Baltimore where he will be married on Saturday morning to Miss E. Bruce Lacey. From Baltimore the couple will leave for a bridal tour through New York, returning to Oakland within a few weeks where he will reside with his bride. This paper extends to Mr. Browning and his bride-to-be congratulations in advance, wishing them all the joys and none of the sorrows of life.

Two Hurt at Base Ball.

Last Friday afternoon the "Never-Sweats" played the "Industrious" ones a game of ball at the Oakland grounds, which resulted in a called game on account of the wet condition of the grounds and two sore heads which came into contact with a flying bat which slipped through the hands of one of the players when he struck at a ball and missed it.

The wounded ones were "Jonathan" Cropp and Policeman Sweeney, both on-lookers. Young Cropp was dealt a terrific blow above the eye which laid his skull bare and required the service of a surgeon to close the wound. The policeman escaped with a blow on his nose which increased its size more than double in less time than it takes to tell it. After this series of accidents the base line was cleared and no more casualties took place.

Jurists on a Junket.

Tuesday afternoon upon the adjournment of court the judges and attorneys in attendance went up to Conneway's Farm where supper was served and the return to Oakland made by moonlight. The party was composed of Chief Judge Boyd, Associate Judge Henderson and Attorneys Fred A. Thayer, Edward H. Sincell, John T. Mitchell, J. C. Renninger, Norman S. Heindel, G. S. Hamill, R. T. Semmes and Semmes Hamill. The journey was made in two conveyances and was a delightful outing for the court and members of the bar. The great number of spring chickens devoured by the party greatly depleted Joe's flock and from reports brought back to town by the visitors it is presumed that he would be chickens ahead if he entertained a like number of Methodist preachers.

Man's Opinion of the Flirt.

No man admires a flirt; no man cares for a girl or woman who is willing to trade pride for flattery. The girl who flirts thinks she is very wise, and that she is making a hit with the fellow with whom she flirts. She would have a very different idea of the matter if she could know his real opinion—if she could hear his account of the incident as he tells it to the "other fellers." There is no such thing as a "harmless" flirtation. No person may put his finger in the fire without getting the mark. No girl can indulge in a flirtation without being considered "cheap" and 'shallow." The fact that the other girls do the same thing is no excuse.

SUCCEEDS McCOMAS

Stevenson A. Williams Made National Committeeman.

Postmaster-General Cortelyou, in his capacity as chairman of the Republican National Committee, late Tuesday afternoon announced the appointment of Hon. Stevenson A. Williams, of Belair, as a member of the Republican National Committee for Maryland, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Louis E. McComas, who has qualified as a member of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

It is understood that Mr. Cortelyou has been holding on as chairman of the Republican National Committee until the settlement of this matter and that he will now retire from that position. Mr. Cortelyou had expected some time ago to retire from the national committee upon the settlement of the contest between the "black-and-tans" and "Lilly Whites" over the vacancy in the Republican National Committee from Louisiana. After the settlement of that fight the Maryland vacancy was created by the appointment of Mr. McComas to the bench, and Mr. Cortelyou postponed his retirement in order to devote his attention to the Maryland vacancy.

Mr. Williams is one of the prominent lawyers of Maryland, was the Republican candidate for Governor against Gov. Edwin Warfield in 1903, was formerly a member of the Maryland Senate, and Mr. Cortelyou regards him as an ideal man for the place. In announcing the appointment Mr. Cortelyou said:

"His appointment was made in the belief that it would prove satisfactory to all elements of the party in Maryland."

It is understood that Mr. Cortelyou regards Mr. Williams as "a clean man in politics," something of the type of the late Lloyd Lowndes. Mr. Cortelyou did not desire to appoint to the vacancy anyone not free of factional entanglements.

The Keeper's Daughter

By FRANK H. SWEET

Copyright, 1905, by Frank H. Sweet

For six days the thermometer had been soaring at almost midsummer heat, softening the ice of the Great South bay until nearly all its cohesive power was gone. Now the ice was a thick, spongy mass, so rotten that even the foot of a life saver pressing upon it firmly would break through at many places. It was impossible either for foot passage or for a boat to be forced through. And to increase the seriousness of the case the last two days had brought a fog so gray and dense as to shut Fire island from every object a dozen yards away.

Out in midchannel toward the Long Island shore and on the ocean side currents had kept the ice from freezing thickly and had hastened the decomposition. Already the delayed shipping was seeking passage toward New York or the open sea and in the fog and the narrow channels that were free from ice was meeting with disaster. From time to time signals of distress came from one direction or another, and so far as they were able the life saving stations of Fire island responded.

Perhaps at no other place in the world could assistance have been rendered across that barrier of slush ice, in which spaces of open water were beginning to appear; but, then, at no other place in the world perhaps were there amphibious scooters.

Several of these unique distinctions of Fire island were lying on the edge of the ice, with pike and scootering iron and oars across the thwarts ready for instant use, while their owners leaned forward, listening, peering and for the most part shaking their heads. The wind was rising, blowing straight from the sea. In another hour it was likely to freshen into a gale. Before it the gray fog was being swirled and tossed and eddied, but still encompassing and dense, a huge wet blanket that seemed writhing in the agonies of pain.

"I SHALL BE WAITING, TOO, JACK," SHE SAID.

On all sides were the sounds of fog and danger bell buoys, boat whistles, occasional fog horns, the pounding and crushing of ice where some vessel was forcing its way through and now and then the ominous signal of distress and call for help. Among these came a sudden dull booming toward the sea and apparently at a considerable distance. The men who were in looked at each other, their faces paling.

"A big ship," one of them said, "and on the bar. Lord help 'em!"

"Yes," assented the man nearest him, "nothing can get to 'em that far out, not even scooters."

There was a peculiar grinding sound near them. A scooter slid up the beach and a man sprang out.

"The other fellows in yet?" he asked.

"Only Carey. He brought a man ashore and sent him up to the station and then hurried back. He said it was a coal barge, with two men and a boy and a dog, and the other scooters will bring them in. The keeper ordered us to watch here for other work. What was yours?"

"Just a sailboat with two young men. They called for help because they didn't know their surroundings. When I explained they decided to remain on board until the ice let them out. They have plenty of provisions and a snug little cabin. I heard the ship's call from outside and hurried back. I couldn't quite make out the location in the fog. Anybody gone?"

"Gone?" derisively. "Why, man alive, that's on the bar three miles away. No scooter could ever get there across the open channel. Besides, the ice has been piled up by the waves. She'll have to wait until the sea opens so we can use a lifeboat or the fog lifts so we can scooter out. No one—Where are you going?"

For the man had swung the bow of his craft back into the fog and was again hoisting the sails.

"Out to the vessel, of course!" quietly.

"But it's sure death, Jack," remonstrated the life saver sharply. "Don't be a fool. You couldn't pick your way through the fog with that scooter and get back alive."

"Maybe not, but that signal sounds like a big boat, and if so there are a good many folks out there waiting for help. I'm only one."

"Oh, Mr. Bowman!" The call was clear and peremptory. Jack Bowman paused, with one foot in the scooter, his face growing set. The owner of the voice was the keeper's daughter, and only the day before she had closed the door into a future which he had begun to believe would be his. The sentence, "I shall never marry a man whose future is bounded by his clam hoe and fish trawl; the world has use for brave deeds," still rang in his ears.

"What is it, Miss Blanche?" he asked, trying to keep his voice calm. "I am in a hurry."

"Father says for no one to answer that call just yet. He thinks this wind will soon break up the ice so the lifeboat can go out. He says it will be suicide to attempt scooting through this fog. Mr. Bowman!" her voice rising in sudden displeasure, for the scooterist had stepped into his craft and thrown out his pike to shove her into the wind.

"I'm sorry, Miss Blanche," over his shoulder, "but the keeper's orders are for his own men and not for a poor outside fisherman like me. Besides, the boat may be in sore need, and, though a little scooter cannot do much, it may at least carry intelligence and perhaps save one or two—provided I can reach them."

The girl's face underwent a sudden change, and she took an impetuous step forward, but already the scooter had slipped away into the fog.

As they waited there, listening, peering, while the hours dragged by, the faces of the men showed something of what they knew to be taking place within the fearsome shifting pall of mist. The scooter was rushing on, dropping into open spaces of water, slipping up again upon patches of rotten ice, swiftly, with scarcely any checking of speed, its owner knowing time was of more importance than caution. Any moment its nose was liable to strike some obstruction and throw out its occupant, the wind at that speed might overturn the scooter or a sudden jibing wreck it without an instapt's warning, either of which on the waste of rotten ice held but one possible fate for the owner.

Two hours and there came another signal of distress close inshore. The waiting life savers dropped into their scooters and slid out into the fog. The girl was still there, watching, her face white. Ten minutes more and a scooter's nose suddenly slipped from the darkness almost at her feet, and Jack Bowman sprang out. Bending over, he lifted a recumbent figure from the scooter to the sand.

"Will you call some one from the station to carry this man up, Miss Blanche?" he said hurriedly as he swung his craft back into the wind. "I haven't time. There are others waiting for me."

The girl moved forward swiftly, placing a hand upon his shoulder.

"I shall be waiting, too, Jack," she said in a low voice. "You must come back to me."

A tremor went through the man's frame, but he did not pause an instant in his work. As the craft disappeared in the fog his voice rose strong and resolute above the wind:

"Yes, Blanche, I will come back to you."

And he did.

Missions Worth While.

How to live comfortably with one's neighbor—that is the problem; to avoid the knocks and frictions which draw lines in men's faces and too often contract their souls. It is paradoxical, but true, that the larger the soul becomes the more room it creates for itself, a margin of quietness in which it remains untouched by petty jealousies and hurts. By the practice of charity and unselfishness a life builds for itself "more stately mansions" wherein it may dwell in peace. A song in one's heart, a smile upon one's lips, a cheery, wholesome message of good will on one's tongue, are wonderful helps to all kinds of people. There are so many burdens of sorrow and care and poverty and sin, so many doubting, discouraged, tempted hearts. To comfort and, to make strong, to lift up and to bless—are these not missions worth while? Try it, friend, and prove how truly your own heart and mind are cheered and made brave by your very endeavor to carry sunshine into dark places.

Would Follow Her Example.

"Mary," remarked Mr. Perkins to the lady who, by the way, was the second one who had shared his joys and sorrows, mostly the latter, as he came downstairs attired for church, "I notice you did not lay out my Sunday clothes in readiness!"

"Too busy getting breakfast to think about you or your clothes either!" replied Mrs. Perkins promptly.

"And my shirt," went on Perkins; "my first wife, poor thing, used to always make my white shirt nice and warm for me to put on!"

"Did she, though?" retorted the dame. "Well, I have heard the neighbors say she used to make things warm for you, and I give you my word, Mr. Perkins, I'll do my best to follow her example."—London Tit-Bits.

Only Girl Babies Grow In Carson City

Of fifty-five births recorded during last year in Carson City, Nev., only one was a male, writes Barrington King of Albany to the London Lancet. The causes underlying the differences in sex (if, in fact, there are any causes other than chance) are not only matters of great interest, but of importance as well. Carson City, where this extraordinary proportion of female births occurred, has in its population a much greater proportion of males than almost any other city in the state, it being a western mining town. Can it be that this is an effort of nature to correct the ratio? If so, has this circumstance been observed elsewhere?

Major Crofoot, The Promoter

The Great American Deadbeat Meets a Humorist and Is Greatly Humiliated.

[Copyright, 1905, by R. B. McClure.]

MAJOR CROFOOT, grand promoter and artful dodger, was seated at his desk and chewing a bit of blotting pad, while he wondered where his lunch for that day was coming from, when his office door opened and a middle aged man entered with a smile on his face. The major at once jumped to the conclusion that it was somebody to invest in his scheme to raise sugar beets on the great Sahara desert, and he rose up and extended his hand and said:

"Good morning to you, sir. Pleasant morning. What can I do for you?"

"Yes, it is a pleasant morning. Ha! ha! ha!" laughed the caller as he helped himself to a chair.

"You—you wanted to see me on business, I presume?"

"Yes, on business. Ha! ha! ha!"

"You perhaps want to make an investment?" continued the major, looking more closely to see if the man had the fires of insanity in his eyes.

"Perhaps I do. Ha! ha! ha! Say, this is a good one."

"You must excuse me, sir, if I fail to catch on."

"Oh, the catching on is easy enough. Don't you remember me, major?"

"I am sorry to say that I do not. Have you ever invested with me?"

"Have I? Have I? Ha, ha, ha! That is a good one."

"My time is very much occupied, sir."

"Yes, I know. That's another good one. Excuse me, major, while I gurgle."

He gurgled and chuckled and slapped his leg for half a minute, while the major studied his features. All of a sudden his identity was revealed.

"So you remember me?" asked the man as he saw the trouble in the major's face. "Yes, I am Green. We used to room and board in the same house. Yes—ha, ha, ha!"

"So this is Green," queried the promoter as he held out his hand—"the dear old friend of other days? How on earth could I have failed to establish your identity at once? You will excuse me, I know. By George, but I was thinking of you the moment you entered!"

"Not a doubt of it, major—not a doubt. Funny, isn't it? Ha, ha, ha!"

"My dear old hilarious boy, I am glad to see you—thrice glad—and especially in such spirits. The last time I heard of you they said you had gone to Mexico and would never return."

"Did they? Ha, ha, ha! Say, that is funny; that is funny!"

And Mr. Green threw himself back in his chair with such force as to carry away its back. He laughed for a full minute, and there were tears in his eyes as he finally straightened up and said:

"You are the same dear old deadbeat and liar, and you ought to have a medal. How many swindles have you got on hand just now? You don't look as prosperous as you might, major, but I suppose you make a few victims. When you finally recognized me your face became as white as death, and you tried your best to swallow your Adam's apple. This is as good as reading a funny book."

"Mr. Green," began the major, trying to look very serious, "I was not always a millionaire."

"No? Ha, ha, ha! Keep it up, major!"

"There was a time, and that not far distant, when I lacked the wherewithal to buy a meal. I had hope and ambition and determination, but no money. One day you came to me and offered me a loan of $5. Never in my life"—

"I came to you? I offered you a loan of $5? Say, major, laugh with me—ha! ha! ha!"

"Never in my life shall I forget your unexpected kindness. You knew nothing about me, but you saw honesty and integrity in my looks, and something must have told you that I would succeed at last. You offered me $5 and I accepted it in the spirit tendered. That sum laid the foundations of my fortune. All I have I owe to you, and I am free to say so."

"All you have!" shouted Mr. Green as he looked around at the office furniture. "Say, major, you grow funnier every minute. You will next be offering to repay the loan—ha! ha! ha!"

"Had I known where to reach you the loan would have been repaid years ago. As it is, I shall not content myself with handing you a check for the amount. Mr. Green, have you ever heard of the Great American Interchangeable Pie company?"

Mr. Green stood up and laughed. Then he leaned against the wall and laughed. Then he sat down and sniggered.

"Our object is to make the American pie known to the civilized world—known and appreciated. No other nation ever built itself up on pie. It is the pie, sir—the American pie—that rules the world. My company proposes to make them by the billion and ship them to every inhabited spot on the globe. From the 1st of October to the 1st of March of every year we shall make mince pies only. Forty-eight ingredients and two crusts in every pie, our trademark plainly stamped on the upper crust, and all persons counterfeiting it will be arrested at once. Every pie sent to its destination in its own wooden dish, and 10 cents will buy one in Persia as well as in Chicago. One price to all, and nothing like 'em. We have already secured hundreds of testimonials."

"Say, now—say, now—ha! ha! ha!" roared Mr. Green as he laughed till he was red in the face.

"From March 1 to Oct. 1," continued the major, without turning a hair, "we shall send out custard, peach, cherry and lemon pies. The price will be the same, and they will give the same satisfaction. The capital is $3,000,000, all paid in, and the stock is already selling above par. Biggest, grandest, richest thing on the face of the earth. The dividends will reach 100 per cent in the first six months. Don't touch Standard Oil—don't fool with the beef trust. Come into the Great American Interchangeable Pie company. That is"—

"That is, you want me for vice president at a salary of $25,000 per year?" interrupted Mr. Green.

"You have struck it exactly. Several years ago you loaned me $5. It was bread cast upon the waters. I want it to return a hundredfold to you. I want you to know and fully realize that the sentiment of gratitude still beats in the human breast. Accept the place, my dear old friend—accept it and let me shake your hand in congratulation."

"Are you through, major?" was asked.

"Well, you can tell me what you will do. If you have a better thing on hand, why, I have nothing to say, but you know I would like to have you with me."

Mr. Green smiled. Then he grinned. Then he chuckled. Then he roared and slapped his leg.

"And the dividends can't be less than 100 per cent after the first six months," solemnly asserted the major, who was a good deal troubled in his mind.

"You slick deadbeat! You noble old liar! You beneficent old baldheaded son of a gun!"

"I do not understand you, sir."

Then Mr. Green rose up with a smile on his face and reached out for the major and made his heels knock over the stove as he swung him around. The second swing cleared the desk, and the third raked the plaster all along one wall. Then the major was stood on his head, stood on his feet, danced up and down and played pitch and toss with, and when he was finally left lying on the dusty floor Mr. Green passed out of the office with a "Ta ta, major. The Great American Interchangeable Deadbeat company wishes you a fond good day!"

The major got up after a few minutes and brushed the dust off and sat down and hummed merrily to himself. He had lost everything but honor, but that was as safe as the rock of Gibraltar.

THE QUALITY OF MERCY

By William Shakespeare

THE first undoubted mention of the play of "The Merchant of Venice" was in 1598. It was published quarto in 1600. Some writers have thought it strange that Portia "should talk Christian doctrine to Shylock." They forget that Portia's doctrine is derived from the Jewish writer who in Ecclesiasticus xxviii, 2, said, "Forgive thy neighbor the hurt that he hath done unto thee, so shall thy sins also be forgiven when thou prayest."

THE quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath. It is twice blessed—
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes;
The attribute to awe and majesty
'Tis mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown;
His scepter shows the force of temporal power,
Wherein doth sit the dread and fear of kings.
But mercy is above this sceptered sway;
It is enthroned in the hearts of kings;
It is an attribute to God himself.
And earthly power doth then show likest God's
When mercy seasons justice. Therefore, Jew,
Though justice be thy plea, consider this—
That in the course of justice none of us
Should see salvation; we do pray for mercy,
And that same prayer doth teach us all to render
The deeds of mercy. I have spoke thus much
To mitigate the justice of thy plea,
Which, if thou follow, this strict court of Venice
Must needs give sentence 'gainst the merchant there.

The Perplexing Conditions Of the Modern World

By President WOODROW WILSON of Princeton University

THE modern world confuses very practiced thinkers, throws very experienced guides out of its way. The age desires law, but cannot find it; seeks order, but does not discover it; would be led, but KNOWS NOT WHOM TO FOLLOW. If quietness of spirit were all, if that life were life enough in which fear and doubt were set at rest and the blood bidden go its slow pace of dull content, as if its very sluggishness were a law of health, one might easily persuade himself that it were enviable to be as the patient, unchanging peoples of the east, with whom life slips by like a watch in the night. But WE are of another creed and impulse.

OUR POWERS STIR TOO IMPERIOUSLY WITHIN US, AND OUR CONSCIENCES TELL US THAT WE SHOULD USE THEM—THE QUIETUDE OF INACTION IS NOT PEACE, BUT IMPRISONMENT.

What is a university but a place wherein to establish the health and natural vigor of minds? And that is not done by knowledge. Knowledge is the mere food and tonic of the mind, learning merely its exercise. The ideal object of education is at once to develop and to simplify the mind by a PERFECT ADJUSTMENT to its uses and to its environment, and such is health.

The modern struggle for wealth is more like a consuming fever than a right function of health. There is in many of our material achievements a touch of frenzy and distemper. Our energy is stimulated to the pitch of intoxication, lacks poise, overlaps the bounds alike of prudence and of pleasure and hurries us, panting, to the BEDS OF EXHAUSTION and sickness, where the physician's task is to get the heat and turmoil out of our blood.

A National Divorce Law Is Needed

By WILLIAM H. TAFT, Secretary of War

LAST year there were 612 divorces out of every 10,000 marriages. If this continues to grow what will become of that which is today THE FOUNDATION OF OUR CIVILIZATION and our state—the home and the family?

OUGHT THERE NOT BE RADICAL MEASURES BY WHICH TO PREVENT THE LOOSENESS WITH WHICH THE MARRIAGE BOND IS TIED AND THE EASE WITH WHICH IT MAY BE DISSOLVED?

If it were given to congress to pass UNIFORM LAWS OF MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE we could be certain—first, that the majority in the congress of the Union would see to it that conservative restrictions upon the law of divorce would be enacted and that for no light reason should there be a separation of those joined together in matrimony under the law; and secondly, we could be certain that, administered as the divorce law would be by judges of the federal courts, subject as they all would be to the general supervision of the supreme court of the United States, THERE WOULD BE A UNIFORM ADMINISTRATION OF THE LAW IN THE COURTS.

LIFE

By Bryan Waller Procter

WE are born; we laugh; we weep;
We love; we droop; we die!
Ah! Wherefore do we laugh or weep?
Why do we live or die?
Who knows that secret deep?
Alas, not I!

Why doth the violet spring
Unseen by human eye?
Why do the radiant seasons bring
Sweet thoughts that quickly fly?
Why do our fond hearts cling
To things that die?

We toil—through pain and wrong;
We fight—and fly;
We love; we lose; and then, ere long,
Stone-dead we lie.
O life! Is all thy song
"Endure—and die?"

The Fall of Petersburg

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

April 2, 1865

[Copyright, 1905, by G. L. Kilmer.]

PROMPTLY on the arrival of news that Sheridan had carried Five Forks on April 1, 1865, General Grant ordered a demonstration on the Petersburg lines. General Humphreys, with the Second corps, attempted to carry the Confederate trenches on its front, but found the enemy too active. A bombardment was kept up all night, and General Grant ordered an assault at 4 o'clock on the morning of the 2d with the men of Ord's, Wright's and Parke's commands. The point chosen for Wright's Sixth corps was to the left of the Weldon railroad, where Federal Forts Fisher and Welch were located. The Confederate picket pits in front of these forts had been taken on the 25th of March, and they now offered shelter for the massing of troops to storm the high parapets which formed the Confederate line here.

General Parke was to move the Ninth corps forward on its own front opposite Fort Stedman and between the Norfolk railroad and the Jerusalem plank road. Wright's corps carried all before it, pressing on to the South Side railroad, leaving, however, the original defenses encircling Petersburg on the right rear intact. This compelled Wright to face about and form a new line. Ord and Humphreys also carried the works on their front, and, pressing through to Hatcher's run, cut the Confederate army south of the Appomattox in two. General Parke's Ninth corps troops took the outer lines in front of them, but could not carry the inner lines. The Confederate artillery was all in position and swept every foot of ground along the whole front. Several attempts were made by General John B. Gordon, who still commanded the Confederates in front of the Ninth corps, to retake the ground seized by Parke, but they all failed. General A. P. Hill was killed on this line while going out to lead his troops against the assailants, who had broken through the intrenchments.

Up to this time General Longstreet had been north of the Appomattox confronting the Army of the James, but the situation in Petersburg drew him, with Field's division, to the scene of the new danger. The river roads along the Appomattox running into Petersburg from the south were held by Ord and Wright. Near where these roads passed the Confederate defenses there were two strong Confederate works, Forts Gregg and Whitworth. Fort Gregg had a garrison of 200 men and mounted two guns; Fort Whitworth had a brigade and three guns.

"THOSE ARE OUR ENEMIES."

When Ord and Wright formed their new lines the Federal division of General Foster of Gibbon's Twenty-fourth corps was in front of Gregg and Whitworth and, advancing under a severe fire, found a wide ditch obstructing the way and batteries cannonading the whole field. A division of supports came up, and two brigades assaulted Fort Gregg and one Fort Whitworth. After a stubborn fight Fort Gregg yielded, and Whitworth was then abandoned.

The Confederates were now completely separated, one column being on the South Side railroad confronting Sheridan and Humphreys, who had swept westward along the track from Petersburg, and the other being in the contracted lines at Petersburg and along the James river toward Richmond. Lee was at Petersburg. It was past noon on Sunday, April 2. The fall of Forts Whitworth and Gregg and the failure to dislodge General Parke's Ninth corps east of the city decided the fate of that place, and Lee ordered preparations to be made for abandonment that night.

Sheridan was pressing on to get his force of cavalry and infantry, the Fifth corps being still under his command, between Lee and Danville, the natural course for him to retreat. At Petersburg the Federal commanders remained alert for every opportunity to strike a telling blow. The pickets kept pressing up to the opposing lines, but at no point in the old works could a weak place be found.

In some places the Federal and Confederate works were within sixty rods of each other, but Lee's barriers were massive and could not be battered down by artillery.

The Confederates gave a good account of themselves in defending their "last ditch." The Federal intrenchments extended from the Appomattox river below the town to the river above, and General Grant ordered a heavy bombardment to be begun at 5 o'clock on the morning of the 3d. This was to be followed by a grand assault at 6 o'clock. But preparations were going on quietly in Lee's lines for evacuation, and this was to be accomplished before the hour fixed for assault.

In the death of General A. P. Hill, a corps commander, the south lost one of its most fiery leaders. It was he of whom Stonewall Jackson spoke in his delirious moments on his deathbed, when he said, "A. P. Hill, prepare for action!"

Hill was the last of the prominent leaders of the southern army to fall, and his death was tragic. He had been in Petersburg during the 1st of April, while Sheridan was fighting Pickett at Five Forks, and on the morning of the 2d had gone, in obedience to orders from Lee, to prepare his troops to reenforce Pickett. Hill's troops, consisting of the divisions of General Henry Heth, General C. M. Wilcox and General William Mahone, were occupying intrenchments on Lee's right in front of the positions held by the Federal corps under Wright and Humphreys. When these commanders made their attack on the morning of the 2d they broke through the Confederate lines completely, and those Confederates who were on their left, or the Petersburg side of the break, were compelled to flee back toward the Appomattox and make a detour to join their fellows on the right of the break. Wright and Humphreys pushed on so rapidly that the Federal and Confederate troops were at times on the same line in alternate spaces.

After fighting desperately to prevent the Federal army from breaking through the works Hill saw that further resistance would be useless and decided to concentrate his brigades and divisions into a shorter line. With Lee he stood upon a lofty ridge south of the city and, pointing to the field in front covered with straggling soldiers, said he would go and join one of the divisions still intact some distance away. Lee tried to dissuade him and, pointing to the troops in the fields through which Hill was to pass, said, "Those are our enemies." In spite of Lee's warning Hill set out on horseback entirely alone. On the way he saw half a dozen Federal soldiers partially secreted in a shallow ravine. He boldly demanded their surrender, and they apparently yielded; but, being alone, he did not attempt to disarm them. They marched by his side or behind him quietly for some distance, and then two or three of them suddenly drew their muskets and shot him dead. This is the story as given in the most authentic Confederate accounts. It conflicts with the Federal narratives.

Lee, anxiously watching the course of his favorite general, witnessed the tragedy. He immediately ordered a brigade of the troops nearest him to charge through the advancing line of enemies to the spot where Hill lay and recover the body. It was done. There seemed poetic justice in the fate of Hill. Never having tasted the bitterness of direct defeat upon the field of battle, he was spared the humiliation of the fall of Richmond and the still greater one of Appomattox, a week later.

The successes of Wright and Humphreys in carrying the Confederate intrenchments south of Petersburg completed the work of the siege, which had been kept up nearly ten months. It is true that Petersburg was not surrounded, but its southern exits were cut off. It could communicate with Richmond, but Richmond was invested north and east, and the play of twenty miles between the two places and a single outlet to the westward from a point between the two was all that remained now to the army with Lee, the chief reliance of the Confederacy.

The losses in the siege have never been separately computed. The lines under Grant's control extended from Petersburg to Richmond, and two armies operated upon them, the armies of the Potomac and of the James. Each of these armies re-enforced the other in the different battles, and their losses figure together in the reports. The fighting at Petersburg began June 9, 1864, when the troops of the Army of the James attempted to seize the place in advance of the arrival of Lee's army. From the 15th of June to the close of the actual fighting in the trenches on April 2, 1865, there had been constant collisions along the lines, collisions varying from picket volleys to actual battles. The Confederates had acted on the defensive with the exception of the assault at Fort Stedman March 25, 1865, and the attempts made at various times to drive off the forces Grant placed in observation along the Weldon road during the summer and fall of 1864. The siege was one of the most remarkable in modern war, because the existence of the Confederacy was staked upon it, and yet the military position involved was at no time actually surrounded. It was simply one end of the Confederate line.

Alas!

THE suit I got but yesteryear
And have so little worn
To rummage sale is doomed, I fear;
Of dignity all shorn.
The coat too tight, the vest too low,
The trousers here too wide
And here too narrow—long ago
'Twas labeled "countrified!"

My auto—ah, my auto fine,
But lately bought and tamed!
When I regard its gauche design
I swear I'm quite ashamed.
With exclamation points galore
The catalogues connive
To show how model nineteen-four
Is ranked by nineteen-five!

My camera was scarce in hand
And settled was the bill
Before I noted that the brand
Was changed and bettered still!
And work on which a painful while
One dentist bored and grooved
Ensuing dentist called "old style"
And said should be removed!

And, oh, my wife, who once I thought
Perfection's apex crowned!
She whom through all the world I sought
Before herself I found!
Not even here did I succeed
And foil for aye regret—
A blond she is, and now I read
The fashion is brunette!

BOOMING THE TOWN.

Benefits Derived From Systematic and Persistent Advertising.

The benefits to be derived from a city or town advertising its advantages as a location for the establishment of manufacturing concerns employing small or large numbers of working people cannot be overestimated. If a merchant can sell his goods by advertising, and of course he can, there is no reason why a city or town or even a wilderness cannot attract people and factories to it by a judicious advertising of its special advantages.

Many cities throughout the country are now engaged in advertising their peculiar advantages by means of books, pamphlets and circulars and even by newspaper advertising.

The business men of Fort Wayne, Ind., are following this plan with remarkable success. Recognizing that they have a splendid city, they propose to spend some money placing the fact before others, using such suitable mediums as will lead to the results desired.

In Dalias, Tex., a club has been organized to use its efforts to increase the population to 150,000. This organization has 300,000 pieces of advertising matter concerning Dallas ready for distribution. It also proposes to use space in Texas newspapers to tell about the city's advantages as a business and residence center.

In Rostbern, Canada, the town council has appropriated $500 to assist a local organization in booming the town.

At 797 Eighteenth street, Denver, is an association called the Colorado Press Bureau, formed for the purpose of telling the world about the great state of Colorado and its daily advancement. This bureau sends out printed matter once a week to leading newspapers presenting interesting occurrences connected with the state's growth.

The city of Williamsport, Pa., has one of the most energetic publicity bureaus in the country, and so has Niagara Falls, N. Y. While all the towns above named are much larger than Oakland and their commercial interests nessarily greater, there is no reason why we as a municipality should take a back seat in the procession. A few dollars judiciously spent for printers ink often brings returns a hundred fold.

COMMITTEE.

GOVERNOR STUNS POLITICIANS.

Upset Well-Laid Plan of Anne Arundel County Office Seekers at Annapolis.

Governor Warfield was the centre of one of the most exciting incidents in the history of Annapolis polities on Tuesday, when he removed one member of the Board of Supervisors of Election from office, asked and received the resignation of another, and served notice on the third that he would remove him if he became a candidate for local office.

The occasion of this coup was the fact that charges had been preferred against Mr. Frank S. Revell, Democratic member of the board and a candidate for sheriff, it being alleged that he was going to make improper appointments for the officials of the coming Democratic primaries.

The Governor received the information that all three of the supervisors were candidates for county nominations.

The Governor sent for the supervisors and placed the matter before them. He obtained the admission of Messrs. Revell and Davidson, Democrats, that they were candidates, while Mr. Werntz was not one. The Governor told the officials that their own sense of decency should make them see that they could not hold a position where they were called upon to appoint the officials who would judge their election.

He then called upon Mr. Revell, his personal appointee under the law, to resign, suggesting the same course to Dr. Davidson, and holding out to Mr. Werntz that the same would be demanded of him in case he became a candidate.

After half an hour Dr. Davidson handed in his resignation, but Mr. Revell, through his counsel, Messrs. Robert Moss and James P. Bannon, declined to resign. Governor Warfield then removed him and appointed Benjamin Watkins in his place. Mr. W. Meade Holliday was appointed in the place of Dr. Davidson.

The whole matter has simply stampeded the Democratic politicians, but the best citizens thoroughly approve the Governor's course.

REV. J. B. WORKMAN'S SUNDAY MORNING SERMON.

His Theme Was That of Temperance and Was Delivered to a Large Audience.

Below we publish by request Rev. J. B. Workman's sermon delivered Sunday morning in the St. Paul's M. E. church.

Remember the Lord which is great and terrible, and fight for your brethren, your sons, and your daughters; your wives and your houses.—Nehemiah 4:14.

"Nehemiah, the author of this text, was born of Jewish parentage during the Babylonish Captivity. But notwithstanding the fact of his foreign parentage he was the cup-bearer of King Artaxexes of Persia. The position which he occupied was a very honorable as well as a very lucrative one.

"By the decree of King Cyrus some years before this time, the Jews, such of them as desired to do so, were permitted to return to Jerusalem and rebuild the temple, and re-establish themselves in the city of their fathers. But while these privileges had been granted, their situation was extremely uncomfortable. The walls of the city were broken down in many places, the gates of the city had been destroyed by fire, and the inhabitants were in a defenseless condition—a condition of which the surrounding heathen nations did not fail to take advantage.

"When Nehemiah learned of these things he felt called of God to go to Jerusalem to repair the walls and rebuild the gates of the city, and thus place his countrymen in a state of security and defense.

"He sought and obtained the consent of his king, and immediately set out on his journey. When he reached Jerusalem he began to prepare for the work. He went out and carefully surveyed the field and familiarized himself with the existing conditions. Then he gathered about him a company of workmen and at once began the work. But as in every reform movement, his work was ridiculed, critisized, threatened and opposed, but still he moved on.

"When it seemed almost certain that the enemy would by force of arms undertake to stop the work, Nehemiah armed his men, appointed guards and then gave to them this solemn charge, 'Remember the Lord, which is great and terrible, and fight for your brethren, your sons, and your daughters; your wives and your houses.' This was to be their battle cry in the expected conflict.

"In the great battles of history there have been certain mottoes, battle cries or expressions which have not failed to excite, or better to say, incite the soldiers to deeds of almost daring and reckless courage. In our recent war with Spain more than once as our soldiers moved into the conflict the cry swept along the lines, 'Remember the Maine,' and as our brave and loyal men thought of Spain's treachery in the destruction of their fellow countrymen, they rushed with enthusiasm into the battle determined to avenge the blood of our fallen heroes.

"But it seems to me that this cry which Nehemiah gave to his men was well calculated to stir their hearts to their utmost depth; and I have no doubt but that, had the conflict come on they would gladly have died at their post rather than have been untrue or disloyal to their sons and daughters, their wives and their brethren.

"There is no greater problem confronting the American people—no fiercer battle to be fought in the first quarter of the 20th Century than the inevitable battle, which must be fought to a finish, with the the American saloon.

"There has never been a time when true courage, true manliness and true womanliness, (for it is already fully demonstrated that woman is to play an important part in this struggle), was more required than will it be in this approaching conflict. Nor was there ever a foe to God or man that was more determined, more strongly intrenched, more totally devoid of principle or scruples than this hideous monster, this defiant devil, this abominable curse, RUM.

"For many years past the forces of righteousness have been awakening and have been sounding the slogan, thus calling the people to arouse to a sense of the momentous issues involved in this terrible fight.

"True it is that many, very many, have been slow to see the magnitude and far reaching consequences of this awful evil if undestroyed. But more and more thinking men and women, in the church and out of it, are coming to realize that the true battle cry is: 'Fight for your brethren, your sons and your daughters; your wives and your husbands.'

"Every reform movement has furnished its heroes and its martyrs. The blood of the Christian martyrs has been the seed of the Church from the day when Stephen cried 'Lay not this sin to their charge' and fell asleep, to the shameful death of the last Christian Chinee who has dared to die for his loyalty to the faith.

"The annihilation of the blighting curse of slavery in this fair land was preceded by the martyrdom of John Brown and others, yea, thousands of others who in the final struggle gave their lives for the cause of freedom.

"Nor has the temperance reform movement been without its noble self-sacrificing heroes and heroines, who have labored and died that they might lay this matter on the hearts of the people. Mother Stewart, Neal Dow, Francis Willard and thousands of others have laid themselves freely and willingly on the altar—and have died not having seen the accomplishment of all of which they dreamed, and for which they labored and prayed, and yet, they died remembering God's promises. Prayers are come up for a memorial before God, 'They that sow in tears shall reap in joy,' and they, by faith have seen afar the victory, which I pray God you and I may live to realize. I have not time in this hour to describe to you the growth and spread of this blighting curse in our land, but I must take time to in away bring to your minds the magnitude of this evil, which every reasonable, intelligent mind will admit is the greatest physical, financial, moral and spiritual curse of the present age. Statistics reveal the fact that it costs more every year in this country than our entire civil service, more than our army, navy and Congress including river, harbor and pension bills; more than all we pay for local government, National, State and County debts, more than all the schools in the entire land.

"Think of the shame of this so called Christian nation when its annual rum bill is $1,200,000,000, all of which is paid by her citizens out of the Lord's money, while we give almost grudgingly $105,000,000 for the support of the gospel at home and abroad, but this cost in money is not to be compared with its cost in blood.

"Think too of the broken hearted, mothers, the humiliated sisters, the despairing, grief-stricken wives, the poor helpless, starving children, the poor old gray-haired disappointed fathers, whose hearts are all crushed by the downfall of their loved ones. O! could we once get this picture—no not a picture—could we get this awful reality before the people as it is, I am persuaded that the work of its destruction would soon be wrought.

"Think of the awful spectacle witnessed a few years ago of an American soldier arrayed in the military attire of our nation and having enlisted in the service of our country standing behind the bar and dealing out liquid damnation to his fellow soldiers in the name of this so-called Christian government.

"Or think of the disgraceful scene exhibition here on the streets of our mountain city on the anniversay of of that eventful day that gave birth to our nation, a day that should be as sacred almost to us as life itself. And yet it was an exhibition of a partnership of Uncle Sam, the Common wealth of Marvland and the conscienceless proprietor of that cesspool of hell known to our citizens as the 'Rubber Tire.'

"When, O! when will our people ever see this evil in all of its hideousness and smite it to death? The liquor traffic has its foul hand on the throat of this nation, and for us to speak of this as a free nation is to misrepresent the case.

"Had I the time and disposition I could bring before your minds this morning many dark scenes, foul crimes, ruined homes, broken hearts, wasted fortunes and wrecked lives as a result of the existence of this awful foe.

"But with this matter thus before us we inquire 'How are we to be free?'

"One says let us restrict the business by a high license law, and thus keep it under control and at the same time obtain some revenue from the business to help to maintain our local and general government. For every dollar received by this government as revenue from this accursed traffic $16 is paid in expenses because of this evil. A brilliant specimen of political economy, and a living illustration of 16 to 1 of another kind than that recently advocated by the Nebraska statesman.

"But here is the issue. Is this business right or is it wrong? If right, encourage it, foster it, and cease to tax it. If wrong, God help us to see the awful sin of becoming a party thereto by authorizing or licensing its existence.

"The only cure for intemperance is prohibition.

"Legalizing crime never removes the curse.

"Prohibition is morally and legally right.

"From beginning to end of God's law we find the words "Thou shalt not," and Blackstone the greatest authority on civil law says 'All law should forbid that which is wrong.' You may look on any side of this question you please and you will find in letters of flame written by the finger of God, 'Prohibition.'

"There is to be no compromise with this foe. This battle must be fought to the finish and the fight is now own.

"I would sound this old time battle cry in your ears this morning, 'Fight for your brethren, your sons and your daughters, your wives and your houses,' and would add with emphasis, 'And your husbands.'

"Some faint-hearted woman may say but what can I do? I have no voice in this matter. I answer you can do much, for, while I am sorry the privilege of suffrage is denied you, yet I rejoice that you have freedom of speech, and can do much by way of laying this matter on the hearts and consciences of those who at the polls make themselves felt.

"Mothers think of your daughters, fathers think of your sons and for their sake, and for the sake of humanity and for the sake of Jesus Christ who died that we might be free, fight mightly against this foe.

"But how shall its destruction be brought about? I can not tell but it is coming. I turn to the first clause of my text and there I read, 'Remember the Lord, great and terrible.' That meant much to the Jew at this time. It carried him back to scenes in the history of his people that were marvelous indeed. Times wherein the Lord had helped and delivered them. They doubtless remembered the deliverance at the sea and the destruction of their foes. They thought perhaps of the battle with Amaleck at Rephadim, and Joshua's success while Moses prayed. They remembered too the crashing walls of Jerico when the trumpets of Israel peeled forth its doom. By these remembrances they were doubtless inspired and encouraged.

"Let us remember how, when like a mighty pall the curse of slavery overshaeowed this nation, and brave, noble hearts quaked for fear lest our nation be destroyed through its blighting influence, God opened the way, and though it cost blood and tears and bitter and awful struggle—The Lord Great and Terrible led on to success and more than 3,000,000 human slaves were given their freedom.

"This liberty, this victory, this freedom of which we speak and for which we labor, and which we even dare to hope to see, may cost blood and tears, it may cost millions of money, but the Lord great and terrible is in the lead, and when he is for us who can be against us? Let us remember him and remember too that we are fighting for our brethren, our sons and our daughters, our wives and our houses, and after a while—and God hasten the day—this foe will be put under his feet, and thousands of poor inebriates will be freed from their galling chains of slavery. Amen.

BROWNING—LACEY. Prof. E. A. Browning, school examiner for Garrett county, and Miss Elizabeth Bruce Lacey were married Saturday in the Immaculate Conception Church, Baltimore. They will spend about two weeks on a tour of the eastern cities and seaside resorts, after which they will return and make their future home in Oakland. The bride is a descendant of one of the oldest and most favorably known families of Southern Maryland, and is the only daughter of Mrs. Venetia Lacey, of Baltimore.

A colony of willing workers assembled at Mr. Lloyd Lowndes farm near Rawlings to enjoy a good old-fashioned barn raising, such as our forefathers were wont to revel in as one of the altogether few pioneer social divertisements. There were some seventy-five men gathered to lift and pin the frame of the barn in place, and the work was pushed with remarkable celerity in that before nightfall the huge frame was in position. When completed, this will be one of largest barns in the state of Maryland. Its length including the main barn and L is 245 feet, while its width is 50 feet. It is being erected on a stone foundation and the slate roof to cover it will weigh forty-five tons. It is three and one half stories in height and has ample room for twenty horses, forty cattle, eight hundred tons of hay, and all the implements and other products and utilities upon the farm.

MOSSER VS. FAZENBAKER.

Renewal of Hostilities Tuesday Between Swanton Residents.

For some months past there has been more or less scrapping between the various members of the Mosser family and Dr. Charles J. Fazenbaker, of Swanton, which at times has involved from one to four or five members of the former family on the one side and Dr. Fazenbaker on the other.

Their troubles have been brought to the attention of each succeeding court for several terms resulting in a fine being imposed upon one or the other of the combatants which has seemingly only embittered the feeling.

Tuesday hostilities were renewed, Dr. Fazenbaker coming off second best as usually happens. On that day the doctor wishing to visit a patient located some distance from Swanton and the railroad being the easiest means of affording transportation, he was at the station there when a freight train was passing with the intention of boarding it. He failed to see the brakeman, however, who happened to be Frank Mosser, a member of the family with whom he has been at odds as above stated, and when he laid hold of a handrail to draw himself aboard the car he was kicked in the face, so he alleges, by Mosser, the kick inflicting a cut below his eye which laid his cheek bone bare and discolored his face to some extent. As a result of the encounter the doctor failed to take that train but got on another later in the day and came up to Oakland with the avowed intention of having Mosser arrested. Whether or not this has been done cannot now be stated.

The Ladies' Guild.

E. church, Oakland, will hold their annual lawn fete and bazaar on Thursday afternoon, August 17th, and they take this means to notify all who may be interested; also to solicit donations from the summer guests who have so generously assisted them on former occasions. Any one wishing further information can call upon or address

MRS. BOWIE JOHNSON,
Oakland, Maryland.

Garrett County Baptists.

Beginning on Wednesday last and ending on Sunday, the Western District Baptist Ministerial Association of Maryland held an interesting conference in the Deer Park Baptist church. Various topics of interest to the Baptist denomination were discussed. Rev. C. W. Hudson, recently installed there in charge of the western part of Garrett county, presented the subject of "Marvland Baptists, Past and Present." On Sunday morning Rev. B. D. Porter, pastor of the Baptist Church of Brunswick, Md., delivered a sermon, and in the afternoon baptism by immersion was witnessed by a large throng. Until quite recently Garrett county has not been visited by the Baptists, Rev. W. H. Faust having within the past year organized a church of this denomination in the village of Deer Park. The field was found too large, and Rev. C. W. Hudson, a native of Baltimore, was placed in charge of the Friendsville district, and he and Mr. Faust co-operate.

The Baptist services, whenever held, have been well attended, and the members of the denomination are much encouraged.

The Fatalism of Esther

By INA WRIGHT HANSON

Copyright, 1905, by Ina Wright Hanson

"I don't see any wrong in it!" I announced stoutly.

Esther laughed.

There had been a time when Esther's laughter was a privileged sight as well as sympathy. Dimples played hide and seek around her challenging mouth, but the very birthplace of laughter lay in her eyes, cerulean and black lashed. Now I was troubled over Esther's laugh. It began and ended with her little mouth and never reached to her eyes at all.

"If I owned something," I continued, "and while I was away some one took it, whether by mistake, not knowing it belonged to me, or by intention, shouldn't I have a right to take it away from him?"

"Oh, sophistry, thy name is Jack! How came you to own me?" Esther queried gently.

"By right of discovery," I answered promptly. "Years and years ago"—

"Not so many," murmured Esther.

"Well, the day that you walked shyly into the schoolroom and the teacher gave you a desk next to mine and without once glancing my way you went to reading in your little book."

"And you naughtily interrupted my diligent study by smuggling over to me a white candy, which flaunted crimsonly on its somewhat sticky surface the impudent question, 'Will you be mine?'"

"What did you do with the candy?" I asked eagerly.

Esther toyed with the diamond on her third finger—maledictions on its bold glitter.

"I ate it," she acknowledged.

"You darling!" I exclaimed. "Of course you ate it, and by that sign and symbol you became mine that minute, and you are mine now. Esther, take off that ring."

"Jack," she said gravely, "you are letting your fancy run away with your good sense. We were children then. If we had grown up together it might have been different, but your path lay in the east, while mine led me west, where I met Judge Wells. I had forgotten you"—

"GOOD MORNING, JUDGE."

"Esther!" I protested.

"Had forgotten you," she repeated, though a flush belied her words. "So when Judge Wells did me the honor, the very great honor, Jack, to ask me to marry him, I consented. If you had stayed in the east, where you belonged, all would have been well, but you must come out here and make me miserable!" She turned suddenly toward the window, and her little hand made a quick move toward her eyes.

"Esther, dear, it were better that you are miserable now for a little time, better that I came before your marriage than afterward. It isn't too late to rectify matters now, dear."

"It is too late," she insisted, "and I am not your dear. It is right for me to marry Judge Wells, or it wouldn't have happened so. If you were the right one, why didn't you come sooner?"

"Esther, you are a fatalist."

"You may call me what you please, but I must do right. I have promised to marry Judge Wells"—

"It isn't right for you to give yourself to him when every time you see him you wish it were some one else. When you shrink from his highly respectable kisses"—

Esther turned sharply toward me.

"What right have you to say—how do you know I do—that?"

Poor little innocent darling.

"I know you love me," I answered gloomily.

Esther neither denied nor assented. She stood quite still and looked out the window. I left my chair and went over to her.

"Little girl, you won't be happy. I should say it even if I didn't want you so badly myself. Judge Wells is immaculate in appearance, manners, morals, but he is not sympathetic. He never palliates an offense in his legal work nor overlooks an indiscretion in his private life. He"—

"I think you misjudge him, but anyway it isn't a question of my own happiness. I settled all that since you came, but I can make him happy, and I promised, and I will. Oh, Jack, if you won't go away, let's go out in the air! I'm stifling."

I brought her garden hat, all wreathed with flowers the color of her dear eyes, and we went out. We went down the walk into the dusty highway. We ascended a hill and stood at the top, watching some boys coasting down the other side. They sat in their wagons—they had two roped tandems—and, with their feet upon the axle to guide their course, they steered swiftly and noisily down the slope.

"We used to coast on sleds down snow covered hills, Esther," I remarked. Then an object in the distance caught my eye. I was properly thankful just then that Esther's pretty eyes were a trifle nearsighted. The boys were dragging their wagons slowly toward us.

"Esther, let's hire the wagons and coast down the hill—just once, for the happy old times' sake."

She laughed nervously.

"How absurd, Jack! Suppose somebody saw us?"

"It's a small request when you deny me happiness," I whispered.

She was silent, so I made the bargain with the grinning boys. With some weak protesting from Esther, I assisted her into the back wagon and took my place in the front.

"Not a great amount of room, but we can't always have everything just to suit us," I remarked cheerfully, putting my feet on the axle and taking the wagon tongue in my hands.

With considerable advice from the officious owners, we were off. Faster and faster we sped, dodging rocks, running perilously near a live oak tree and drawing up on the little wooden bridge into the dignified presence of Judge Wells.

"Good morning, judge," I said jauntily. "Great sport, this California coasting. Do you ever indulge?"

But the judge took no notice of me. His horrified gaze was upon Esther, his affianced wife, curled ungracefully in the trailer, her hat gone, her yellow hair rippling over her shoulders, and her laugh ringing out like a reckless child's.

The judge opened his mouth, and his words rasped as the filing of a saw:

"Miss Graham, I wish to consider our engagement as if it had never existed. I must deny myself the pleasure of being the life companion of a—um—holden!"

With stately stride the judge ascended the hill. The boys had overtaken us. I paid them, and they ran, shouting, away. Then I turned, not without some misgivings, toward Esther. She was crouched on a rock at the end of the bridge, her yellow hair covering her as with a mantle, her shoulders shaking ominously. Was it with grief or laughter? I advanced—retreated—advanced. Then she spoke:

"Jack, dear, are you sure you paid those precious boys enough?"

And, looking at her, I was content, for the laughter that played around her challenging mouth had also returned to her pretty eyes.

Self Protecting Plants.

Plants protect themselves much the same as insects. One of the uses of the movements of the sensitive plant is to frighten animals. A venturesome, browsing creature coming near it is afraid to touch a plant which so evidently is occupied by spirits. The squirting cucumber of the Mediterranean alarms goats and cattle by discharging its ripe fruits explosively in their faces the moment the stem is touched. The cucumbers contain a pungent juice, which discharges itself into the eye of its opponent, and the smarting sensation which results is hard to bear. The dainty grass of Parnassus is beautiful, but dishonest. It is a bog herb, has glossy green leaves and pure white blossoms and is supposed to be the poet's flower. Its milk white flowers are lovely, yet they are deceivers. The drops of honey which bees and insects fancy they see inside the petals are solid, glassy imitations of honey, which fool the bees, which are lured in this way that they may carry off the pollen to other blossoms and are held fast until they die.

His Reliable Authority.

"In a case in San Francisco once," said a lawyer, "we were trying to break the will of an elderly man who, ignoring his relations, had left the bulk of his property to a total stranger. It was part of our case to prove that the dead man had been eccentric, irregular, cruel and dissipated, and after we had proved this point the defense summoned a witness in rebuttal.

"The first question put to the defense's witness was, 'What do you know about the character of the deceased?' And the man answered, sir, in words like these:

"'He was a man without blame, beloved and respected of men, pure in all his thoughts and'—

"But I interrupted the witness.

"'Where,' I said, 'did you learn all that?'

"'I got it,' the man answered, 'from the tombstone.'"—Salt Lake Tribune.

Warding Off Old Age.

A famous French general when asked how it was that he had such an erect carriage replied that it was because he bent over and touched the floor with his fingers thirty times every day. If he had acquired rigidity of the spine so that he could not do that he would have had with it weak abdominal muscles, which result in portal congestion. This portal congestion interferes with stomach digestion and with the action of the liver. The poison destroying power of the liver is lessened, auto intoxication results and arteriosclerosis and old age come on at a much earlier day. But by keeping the spine flexible and the abdominal muscles strong and taut the portal circulation is kept free and old age is held off.—Good Health.

Mr. Bowser As Gardener

The Philosopher Tries Again to Raise Flowers In His Back Yard.

TO KEEP HEART SOFT

Dog Fight In His Hollyhock Bed, However, Destroys His Faith In Human Nature.

[Copyright, 1905, by R. B. McClure.]

WHEN Mr. Bowser came home from the office the other evening he was loaded down with a rake, a shovel, a spade and numerous packages of seeds, and when Mrs. Bowser met him on the front steps he smiled a farmerish smile and explained:

"I forgot to tell you before I went away this morning that I intended to make a garden this evening."

"But you had such trouble last spring," she protested.

"Yes; the blamed old cats around here destroyed everything, but I am going to try it again just the same. I tell you, I have got to have something green to look at when I come home—something that I can feel belongs to me. I ought to have been a farmer, but as I am not the next best thing to do is to turn gardener a bit."

MR. BOWSER PUT HIS STRENGTH INTO HIS WORK.

"What do you think of planting?" she asked.

"Well, sunflowers and hollyhocks anyhow and perhaps three or four other things."

"Isn't it rather late?"

"It's just the right time. The soil is getting warmed up, and tonight we have a full moon. Mrs. Bowser, I really believe that what makes so much wickedness in this world is the lack of flowers in our back yards. If I was contemplating murder and I saw pink and white hollyhocks rearing their beautiful flowers to heaven it would soften my heart toward all mankind. In making garden, you see, I get the benefit of the earthy smell, the exercise, the anticipation and the flowers later on."

"Well, go ahead," observed Mrs. Bowser, "but don't blame me if anything happens."

"But what can happen?"

"Last year, after the cats got through with your beds, there was one sunflower came up. It got to be about a foot tall, and then one day there came up a thunderstorm and the lightning struck it. You said it was all my fault and wouldn't speak to me for the next twenty-four hours."

"Nonsense! You must have dreamed that. Am I fool enough to think you control the lightning? I was sorry, of course, but I said nothing to you."

"Then you won't blame me this year?"

"What bosh! What am I going to blame you about? I am going to have a few sunflowers and hollyhocks in our back yard to give it a homelike aspect and to keep my heart soft toward my fellow men. If you take the ax and chop them down when they come up or if you try to climb them when they are grown I may have something to say; otherwise, not."

After dinner Mr. Bowser changed into his old clothes and carried his outfit to the back yard and began work. The feelings that come to a farmer in the merry, merry springtime came to him. Crickets sang from under the fence, beetles hopped about, and a bumblebee came sailing along and missed his head by half an inch. There were no robins or bluebirds singing, but it was easy to imagine that such was the case, and he drew a long breath and said to Mrs. Bowser:

"By thunder, but this is living, this is! Do you know, I've almost a mind to trade our place here for a farm. Just look around you and realize how soft and gentle everything is. No one is cursing or fighting, there is no spirit of revenge in the air—all is peace and good will to men. I even feel balmy toward our old cat, though there are times when I want to knock his blamed old head off."

"I am glad you feel good over it," replied Mrs. Bowser as he began spading, but she was certain in her own mind that something would happen to put him out before the night was over.

Mr. Bowser put his strength into his work, and at the end of half an hour he had the back yard pretty well torn up. The capitalist who built the house never intended the back yard to be used as a garden. That was the reason he filled it in with plaster, brickbats, old cans, chunks of wood and shavings. It could be turned into a menagerie if the buyer so elected, but never into a garden. Farmer Bowser worked away with right good will, however, and before the sun went down his sunflower and hollyhock seeds had been committed to the keeping of old Mother Earth. A few cats came walking along the top of the fence to be present on the auspicious occasion, and now and then a hoodlum going home through the alley threw a beer bottle at the gardener, but things went off without any riot. Other ground would be prepared for seeds the next evening.

"I want to tell you," said Mr. Bowser when all had been finished for the night and he had laid the tools away and lighted his cigar, "that I am a better man for what I have done this evening. When I got off the car a man stepped on my foot and called me a behemoth instead of apologizing. I called him a liar and intended to go out after dinner and lick him. Yes, I was going to pound him to a jelly, but the idea has fled far, far away. If he should come along here now and ask me why I didn't use the back of my neck for my throat I'd only laugh at him. The closer one gets to nature the more he can forgive in his fellow men. Why, if ten banana peddlers came along here and each one stopped to yell at the top of his voice you wouldn't see me get mad."

"If I should ask you for $5 to get a new pair of shoes with, could you spare it?" asked Mrs. Bowser.

"Why, of course, my dear—of course. That is, I haven't got it right in my pocketbook this minute, but the first time I have it to spare you can count on it. Do you remember one night about two months ago when you called up the subject of my love letters to you before we were married?"

"Yes."

"Well, I got mad and denied that you had a single one. You said I called you deary, ducky, angel, sweetness and all that, and I answered that if I did I must have been a fool."

"Well?"

"Well, I want to beg your pardon. I not only called you by all those names, but probably gave you the idea that I was the biggest jackass in America. If you would take a club to me about once a week I should be a better man."

The bats came out and buzzed around, the evening grew old, and after reading up on sunflowers and hollyhocks Mr. Bowser was ready for bed. His garden, as he saw from a back window, was lying fertile and untouched in the bright moonlight, and such a softness stole over him that he picked up the cat and begged her pardon if he had ever called her yaller eyed and plotted against her life. He talked agriculture for half an hour and then fell asleep, and Mrs. Bowser soon followed, thankful that nothing in the way of a calamity had happened. Two hours later she dreamed that she was in South Africa and hearing the roar of a lion, and the dream was so vivid that it awoke her. No sooner were her eyes open than she found the roar to be real.

It was Mr. Bowser roaring from a back window. She ran through to him just as he had heaved the water pitcher after the washbowl. Down on the earth beneath the window were six or eight dogs that had come in through the alley gate. They had raked and scratched and rolled, and his garden and sunflowers and hollyhocks were no more.

"Woman," he said as he found her beside him, "behold your work!"

"My work? Why, what have I got to do with it?"

"Spite, envy, jealousy! I see your fine Italian hand at every turn. I wanted a garden; you didn't. You have defeated me, but—but"—

And then he rushed downstairs and out into the yard, and, seizing a clothes pole, he did his best to slay and to slaughter. Under the full moon, with the earthy smell rising to heaven and the crickets chirping their notes of gladness, he jumped up and down and swore that nothing short of blood would satisfy his longings for revenge.

A Poem for Today

HOLY FORTITUDE

By Isaac Watts

AM I a soldier of the cross?
A follower of the Lamb!
And shall I fear to own His cause,
Or blush to speak His name?

Must I be carried to the skies,
On flowery beds of ease?
Whilst others fought to win the prize,
And sailed through bloody seas?

Are there no foes for me to face?
Must I not stem the flood?
Is this vile world a friend to grace,
To help me on to God?

Sure I must fight if I would reign;
Increase my courage, Lord;
I'll bear the toil, endure the pain,
Supported by Thy word.

Thy saints, in all this glorious war,
Shall conquer, though they die;
They view the triumph from afar,
And seize it with their eye.

When that illustrious day shall rise,
And all Thy armies shine,
In robes of victory, through the skies—
The glory shall be Thine.

Motherhood the Best Guarantee of Good Citizenship

By Rev. ANNA H. SHAW, President National Woman Suffrage Association

WE call ourselves a republic. Are we? A republic is a country governed by representatives elected by the people. Are WE? No. The men of our country elect the representatives, but the men are only a fraction of the people, and no matter how good a fraction is IT CAN NEVER BE THE WHOLE.

The Puritans caught the idea of religious liberty for themselves, but they denied it to others; yet they regarded themselves as upholding freedom. Church members only were at the time allowed to vote. After the close of the Revolutionary war it was the taxpayer only who could vote. Later, under Thomas Jefferson, the great democratic principles were advocated, and white male citizens only might cast their ballot. Next was blotted out the word "white" and MALE CITIZENS ONLY may vote.

This country can never be a true republic while these limiting words stand. If the true republic would be upheld every citizen, male and female, at the age of twenty-one should have the right of franchise. Disfranchised persons are described as "male idiots, male lunatics, male criminals, male children—AND WOMEN." Why should there be that distinction? Why do governments exist? For the protection of property, for the fulfillment of law, for the development of the people. Are not women interested in these matters? A woman from cradle to the grave has her life regulated by the government. Should she not have something to say about what shall be the kind of government she is controlled by?

In old times the men of this country made new laws FOR THEMSELVES, but imported the old common law FOR THE WOMEN, the common law preventing the married ones from holding or inheriting property or in collecting wages if they earned them. During the last sixty years, since woman's suffrage has been agitated, these laws have been improved, so that now married as well as single women may hold property.

Last year Massachusetts passed a bill for which the women of the state had been working for fifty years entitling a woman to a legal right in her own child.

There are now 500,000 children under fourteen years of age at work in factories, and women who are struggling to get bills passed to prevent it have not been able to accomplish it. President Roosevelt has been lecturing on the subject of race suicide. IS THERE ANY RACE SUICIDE LIKE THIS? Since women are interested in the protection of property, in the administration of justice and in the development of the race, it would seem that they should have a share in making the laws.

THERE ARE WOMEN WHO ARE UNFIT FOR SELF GOVERNMENT, AS THERE ARE MEN UNFIT, BUT IN EACH CASE THEY ARE IN THE MINORITY. WOMEN HAVE THE BEST GUARANTEE OF GOOD CITIZENSHIP THAT EXISTS, AND IT IS MOTHERHOOD.

A Poem for Today

A REQUIEM

By Robert Louis Stevenson

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON, poet and romancer, was the son of a lighthouse engineer and was born at Edinburgh in 1850. He studied at the university in that city and became a lawyer, though he never practiced. On account of his ill health he went to Samoa, where he lived with his family and wrote his books. He died in 1894 and was buried on a Samoan hilltop.

UNDER the wide and starry sky,
Dig the grave and let me lie.
Glad did I live and gladly die,
And I laid me down with a will.

This be the verse you grave for me:
Here he lies where he longed to be;
Home is the sailor, home from sea,
And the hunter home from the hill.

Hot Battle at Fort Gregg

A FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY WAR STORY

April 2, 1865

[Copyright, 1905, by G. L. Kilmer.]

GRANT never closed the lines completely around the Confederates at Petersburg, but came very near doing so on the morning of April 2, 1865, the last day of the siege, about the hour when Lee telegraphed to Jefferson Davis at Richmond, "My lines are broken in three places," and warned his government that evacuation must follow speedily. The gap in the lines of the besiegers which had been Lee's salvation for months and which he had kept open by the most desperate fighting was about to be closed in consequence of those three breaks in his lines caused by the vigorous assaults of three of Grant's corps under Generals Parke, Wright and Ord.

These assaults began at daylight April 2, with the determination on the Federal side of finishing the fight then and there.

After the breaks in Lee's lines the North Carolina brigade of General J. H. Lane was making its way by the curling up process from the broken front line toward the main Confederate line at the gap, disputing every inch of ground. About 8 or 9 o'clock in the morning the general and his adjutant, Captain Hale, reached an empty battery known as Fort Gregg or Battery Gregg, which was an outlying work that an extension of the Confederate line months before had rendered useless. It was a quarter of a mile or more in advance of the main Confederate trenches, toward which the combatants were racing, the Confederates being, of course, on the inside. Lane had orders to hold on as long as possible and gain time for the beaten troops to rally on the main line and for the expected re-enforcements to cross the river and occupy them.

As his men had been strung out at wide intervals when attacked and dispersed by the Federal columns at daylight, only fragments could be called together at any given spot, and he placed in Fort Gregg portions of the Thirty-third and Thirty-seventh North Carolina infantry, under four lieutenants—F. H. Snow, A. B. Howard and F. B. Craige of the Thirty-third and D. M. Rigler of the Thirty-seventh. He also got up two six-pounder guns with some artillerists of Chew's Maryland battery and of the famous Washington artillery battalions. Lieutenant McElroy of the Washingtonians handled the cannoneers, about twenty-five in number. About the same time twenty men of Thomas' Confederate brigade and twenty-five of Harris' Mississippians joined the garrison, swelling it, according to the best accounts, to 214. Lieutenant Snow commanded Lane's men, and J. H. Duncan led the detachment from Harris' brigade. General Harris, with the bulk of his brigade, occupied Fort Whitworth, a companion to Gregg. Before leaving Fort Gregg to its fate General Lane sent in twenty-five rounds of artillery ammunition and ordered Snow to hold it to the last. At that time the Federal guns were firing upon the little citadel, which was a slight earthwork with low parapet, over the top of which its own cannon were discharged. At 10 o'clock, by a mistaken order probably, the cannon of Fort Whitworth were sent to the rear, and as this act was witnessed by the Federal troops in front the charge was sounded to attack the isolated batteries, Whitworth and Gregg. The assailants numbered 5,000 and were led by General John Gibbon. Gregg stood first in the way and felt the brunt of the onslaught.

The cannoneers in Gregg stood to their guns gallantly. Three men were shot dead, one after another, in the attempt to discharge a single piece. When the assailants reached within forty yards the infantry garrison gave them a stinging volley, causing them to waver and then give way. A second charge followed, and the assailants reached within thirty yards. The Confederates held their fire until the proper moment and then, with a wild yell, let go, sending down a man for every musket. The Federals stood for a moment and then broke and scattered. A third, a fourth and a fifth charge followed, each with much the same result as the first two.

With the fifth charge on the front a line of assailants swung around in rear of the fort and attempted to gain an entrance. On the front the attack was carried as far as the moat. Over an hour had passed since the first assault, and the artillery in Gregg used all its ammunition and had lost heavily. The surviving gunners took up small arms and joined the infantry in beating off the assailants. The work was virtually surrounded.

When the line at that point was originally built, Forts Gregg and Whitworth were intended to be connected by a trench and breastwork sheltered by a palisade. The work had been begun at the Gregg end, and about thirty feet of trench had been made, the dirt thrown out forming an embankment as high as the walls of Fort Gregg and connecting with them. In attempting to surround the fort the assailants mounted this strip of embankment and very soon found it a means of getting upon the coveted parapet without first descending into the deep moat beneath it.

Rushing upon this point, they overwhelmed the handful who manned that corner of the work. So desperate did the garrison defend their ground that the parapet was covered with Federal dead. At one time six Federal flags were floating on the walls, while the Confederates fought around their own stars and bars in the interior of the work.

At the last moment, when the Federals in numbers were leaping down inside from all directions and making prisoners of their opponents by sheer physical strength, one of Lane's North Carolinians seized the colors under which he and his comrades had fought so fiercely, dashed past the swarm of assailants on the parapet and, with the flag floating defiantly, ran at the top of his speed back to the Confederate main line, where he was received with wild cheers. Scores of bullets had been aimed at him as he flew across the open plain, 500 yards, within range of hundreds of Union muskets.

There was no formal surrender. Gibbon's men crowded in on all sides, and the Confederates resisted to the last. The fighting did not end when the assailants got inside, for, despite the efforts of their officers, some of the enraged men exacted the victor's privilege of vengeance upon the unfortunates who had made such a hopeless yet bloody defense.

The dead Confederates numbered fifty-seven; the unwounded prisoners were only thirty. The loss on Gibbon's column in front of Fort Gregg is placed at 500 to 600 in killed and wounded. As soon as Gregg fell its captors turned the two cannon upon the neighboring Fort Whitworth, and the garrison of that work marched out and surrendered. The gap in the lines along the Appomattox was now filled by Grant's troops, but some hours had been consumed in accomplishing this result, and meanwhile, thanks to the delay in the Federal march caused by the holding out of Fort Gregg, Lee had been able to man his interior line in such strength as to hold it the remainder of the day. His circle of defense around Petersburg was still complete, and no further impression was made upon it by Federal assaults.

The Federal officers and men confidently expected that the end was near, and that Petersburg would be evacuated during the night.

Oakland, Md., May 2, 1905.

THERE is big wheat news coming in from Kansas—90 bushels to the acre from one farm in Ford county. Maryland farmers who know a thing or two about great wheat yields may doubt whether enough straw can be stood on end over an acre to shell out 90 bushels. There will be a suspicion that the acre reported was strided off by a long, lanky Kansan who stepped two yards every time and then counted one yard to a stride.

CELEBRATING his seventy-second birthday Senator Thomas Collier Platt, national political leader and head of great corporations, rich in dollars and in experience, stands up before the world and says: "Seventy-two years old—a great many days and months and years—some of them fruitful, some barren, but none of them worth while. No, it is has not been worth while!" Deeply pathetic words from a man who appears to have drawn from life all that is worth the living. Yet "not worth while!" There's a lesson in the aged leader's words for every man and every woman of this nation of ours. Take it home to yourself. Seventy-two years of honor and success given to few men, but "not worth while."

THE GOVERNOR'S STAND.

Governor Warfield's prompt and drastic action in removing one of the Anne Arundel election supervisors and demanding the resignation of another will be approved by all lovers of fair play and free elections. On the other hand, it will probably shock the sensibilities of believers in Poe amendments, and other schemes for defeating fair play and destroying free elections.

The principle of the Governor's action is sound. These supervisors were candidates for local offices. The fact that they needed an official hint to acquaint them of the impropriety of participating in the selection of judges and clerks for an election which they—the supervisors—were candidates, is itself an indication that they were not the right kind of men for the place.

By his act Governor Warfield gives further emphasis to his declaration and action on the Poe measure, since it is a practical demonstration, that he stands resolutely against anything which smacks of unfair advantage in the conduct of our elections.

STATE-AID GOOD ROADS.

With contracts let and the work begun upon about sixteen miles of highway, the actual construction of State roads in the various counties of Maryland under the new State Aid Road Law is now well under way. Plans and estimates for thirty pieces of roads varying in length from one-half to two miles have been sent out by the Highway Division of the Maryland Geological Survey by the County Commissioners.

Within a few months, therefore, there will be established specimens of modern, permanent stone roads, to serve as example of practical economy and general satisfaction.

Some criticism has arisen, however, in certain instances which should be corrected and the fact thoroughly explained. One such criticism has been unfavorable comment upon the State Geological Survey Commission over the selection of pieces of road to be improved, the Commission being held accountable for the particular selection in these instances. Criticism was further made that numerous comparatively short pieces of road (from one-half to two miles each) were to be improved instead of longer stretches. At the offices of the State Geological Survey Commission, however, the following explanation of the situation is given:

The Commission whatever its opinion may be as regards the advisability of improving a certain piece of road, cannot act in the matter unless the county authorities first petition the State for aid on that road. The Commission has a veto power—it can refuse State aid on the ground that the improvement of a road petitioned for would not be a sufficiently public improvement to justify the expenditure of State funds, but this situation has not yet arisen, and if there is any dissatisfaction in any part of the State over the selection of the roads to receive State aid, the responsibility must be placed on the county authorities. As a matter of fact, in Baltimore county State aid has not been asked on less than one mile in any place, and in one district aid has been applied for on a stretch five miles in length.

It is generally held that the interests of a county will be better served by building small sections of road in different parts of the county, rather than one long piece running through one section, for two reasons: First, that the general distribution of pieces of good highway will enable all sections to share equally in the advantages therefrom: and, second, that the educational feature of such distribution, in illustrating the value of properly built roads, will be more effective when widely distributed. Inasmuch as the recent flood so widely damaged the roads of some counties, it is believed that the County Commissioners will now be glad of the opportunity to build small pieces of road here and there under the petitions filed for State aid this year, and by so doing give all sections an opportunity to profit by the State Aid Act.

The recent flood demonstrated very emphatically the wise policy and economy of building bridges of concrete on county roads, a matter which has been urged by scientific road builders for some time past.

A striking example of the value of concrete bridges in the event of freshets was given at Sherwood, Baltimore county, where a concrete bridge withstood the force of the water, although the stream rose six feet above the bridge and everything else within reach was swept away.

All the others nine daughters have large families. In addition to the nine daughters Mr. Johnson has eighty-eight grand children and 186 great grand children and forty-nine great great grand children, making a total of 333 direct descendants. Mrs. Johnson was born April 1, 1810, and is now ninety-five years of age. She is still able to read, write and sometimes do her own cooking. She does all her own sewing.

Recently this paper said that a certain lawyer of this city was fined for being "drunk and disorderly." Since that some other lawyers have been complaining about the matter being made public. Some lawyers don't seem to mind having their profession disgraced, but they don't want the public to know it. A drunken lawyer, drunken doctor or drunken editor is a public nuisance. Fortunately Cumberland has but few of them and the few should be ostracized by all good people. — Cumberland Courier.

Work on the new jail is progressing with extreme slowness. The foundation is not yet incomplete and will probably remain so for several weeks. The stone for the substructure is coming in by freight every day or two and is being piled up along the streets and in the lot. One of the contractors was here Tuesday inspecting the work and expressed his dissatisfaction with certain details concerning it.

On another page of this paper there will be found a well written article from the pen of Mr. Charles E. Hove, formerly of this county but now occupying a responsible position as instructor in the Philippines. Mr. Hoye, in his article, deals with the religious conditions now existing on the Islands making a comparison with matters as they were before the Americans put down the instruction. His article is a very readable as well as instructive one.

DEATH IN MANY HOMES.

Lawrence Stanton, a Resident of Garrett County, for Fifty Years.

STANTON—At his home on Fourth street, Oakland, Sunday morning at two o'clock, Lawrence Stanton, aged eighty years, passed peacefully away. He was born in the Parish of Knock, County Mayo, Ireland, coming to America in the year 1850. In 1851 he entered the employ of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and assisted in building that road as far west as Kingwood Tunnel. On July 5th, 1854, he was married to Miss Mary Kearens in Baltimore, and immediately thereafter came to what is now Garrett county where he resided until his death. Mr. Stanton was the father of eleven children, nine of whom survive him, they being Messrs. John W., James A. and Patrick F., of Chicago; Rev. Thomas J. and Miss Catharine, of Lonaconing; Jeremiah M. and Misses Julia and Nellie, of Oakland. Misses Bridget and Mary preceeded him to the grave a number of years ago. Mrs. Stanton died in December, 1898. Mr. Stanton was a life-long, faithful and exemplary member of the Catholic church throughout his entire life and leaves behind him a heritage of a life well spent. His funeral took place from St. Peter's church in Oakland yesterday morning at ten o'clock when a Solemn High Mass of Requiem was celebrated by his son, Rev. Thomas J. Stanton, assisted by Rev. Keohler, deacon; Rev. Smith, subdeacon; Rev. Nolan, master of ceremonies, and Rev. Dorsey in the Sanctuory. The sermon was delivered by Rev. James E. Connell, pastor of the church. Jamison, John Helbig, Alexander Fleckenstein, John T. Browning and A. G. Sturgiss. The interment was made in the Catholic cemetery here. The death of Mr. Stanton removes another of the old landmarks of Garrett county. He was a good, law abiding citizen and claimed the respect of every one with whom he came in contact. He was charitable in the extreme and by his sunny dispositien made and retained many friends.

IMPROVEMENTS AT THE STATION

Railroad Company Will Expend Several Hundred Dollars There.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad officials, who made a recent inspection tour of the road examining the property all along the line, ordered certain improvements to be made at the station in Oaland which included the repainting of the station building inside and outside as well as the little summer house on the south side of the tracks, the water tank adjoining the yard and the freight house. This work has already been completed and next week a force of plumbers will be at work setting a boiler and installing new radiators in all parts of the building for heating purposes, thus making the station a comfortable one and abolishing the use of the unsightly stoves that have been in evidence for the past year or more.

Had a Good Time.

There is a very fine Jersey bull at Uplands Farm near Deer Park. It was purchased when a tiny little fellow and sent to Deer Park in a crate by U. S. Express. It comes of the very best stock and is a real simon pure Jersey. The big fellow, who is called Robert, is kept in an enclosure, and on Sunday last, in some way the gate was left open and Robert camly walked out into a rich field of timothy and clover. Three persons endeavored to collar him and get him back, but he had no inclination to return to the short pasture when so inviting a field was open to him.

Some stacks of hay attracted his attention and he scattered those stacks about as though they had been struck by a cyclone. It afforded him great amusement to scatter the new hay about and after a time he was captured and put back.

Robert is a magnificent specimen of an animal, and is regarded as a valuable acquisition to the farming interests of Garrett county.

Accident On B. & O.

Saturday east bound train No. 12, the St. Louis and New York fast express on the Baltimore and Ohio, jumped the track at Morningsville, W. Va., derailing the tender, mail and baggage cars, day coach, ladies' coach and dining car, leaving nothing but the New York sleeper on the track. Over sixty-five passengers were abroad and all escaped without even a scratch.

About an hour later a westbound freight train jumped the track at Bristol, derailing twelve car loads of coal and tearing up about 100 yards of track. This cut off the Grafton wreckers from going to No. 12 wreck, and it took at least ten hours to clear the road.

The Witch of the Alleganies.

In a little valley surrounded by all the beauties of nature, in a miserable hut, lives this strange woman, whom all the neighbors look upon as being possessed of the power of evil almost equal to that of his "Satanic Majesty." Her hut sits in a lovely place entirely surrounded by a great forest, filled with all the different kinds of trees and growing vegetation. A little brook winds in and out among the trees, and the sportive trout darts to and fro through its clear and placid waters. The birds singing their sweet notes seem to contradict the powers of this much-feared woman.

While the old woman lives all alone in her miserable hut, possessed of great wealth which she inherited from her husband who died many years ago, she denies herself all the pleasures that her wealth might bring her and lives on day after day without being visited by any one, spending her time in solitude, having no visitors save the birds that fly to and fro.

To visit her hut you would imagine it to be the home of a beggar. She has not even a bed to sleep on, but when she lies down to slumber it is in a bunk nailed to the side of her hut. Her furniture consists of an old stove, a table and a few chairs.

Occasionally she visits the grocer in a near-by town to purchase a few necessities of life and then betakes herself back to her hut, there to remain until hunger drives her forth again to replenish her stores. The farmers fear to meet her on the roadway for they say to meet her is to meet with bad luck as she is considered an evil omen. To have her cross a farm is certain to bring disasters for a number of years to the owner of the farm. And the thought is often expressed that they would as leave have the devil to cross their pathway of the "Witch of the Alleganies."

A farmer's son relates the story of the witch appearing in his bed room. He looked at her as she stood beside his bed and as she seemed to put forth her hands over his body he cursed her and hurriedly left his room, related what he had seen to his father, who told him he had been dreaming which the young man strenuously denied; the young man then returned to his room to again retire and positively declared he had not retired more than three minutes when the witch again appeared. He then left his room and found a bed in another room, and no money could induce him to again sleep within this room.

A farmer who had gained the displeasure of the "witch" had a nice drove of cows which seemed to all get ill at once. They seemed to be mad and would bite pieces of wood from the fence rails. A veterinary was summoned but could do no good. At last the farmer declared the cows were "bewitched" and forthwith summoned a "witch doctor" who went through a certain proceeding and said the cows were bewitched and the witch would appear before sunset and would ask questions which would require an answer "no" which no member of the family should say. The witch doctor had scarcely left the farm when the "witch of the Alleganies" appeared and had not been seen upon the farm for a period of nine years. All the members of the family hurried into the house save one young lady who stayed to talk to the "witch." She asked the young lady many questions and she forgetting the instructions of the doctor answered "No." No sooner than she had said the word the witch disappeared and never again set her foot on the farmers property. This is related by the father and is vouched for by the three sons who declare it to be a position fact.

At another time the "witch" had gone to a neighboring village to buy some provisions. She saw a farmer who resided near her and she asked him to haul her home in his wagon which he refused to do and started home with his team. While driving along a very fine horse in his team got very sick but he at last reached home. Suspecting the witch had placed a spell upon his horse he summoned the witch doctor who promptly said that the horse was bewitched and cutting a small portion of the horse's mane cast it in the fire and burned it and told the farmer that the next morning the witch would appear with a burnt foot and asked for a pound of butter which they should refuse and if they did so the wtich would die. True to the doctor's warning the witch appeared the next morning with a burnt foot and begged the farmer's wife until at last she gave her a pound of butter. The farmer, when he returned from the field and learned what his wife had done was very indignant and said she should have carried out the doctor's orders.

It would seem in these enlightened days that no one could believe that witches exist who rides through the air on broomsticks and that this story would belong to the days of "Cotton Mother," but the beliefs still exist among many of the rural people and no amount of reasoning can pursuade them that they are mistaken and the "witch of the Alleganies" lives on in seclusion feared by almost all the people in the whole country where she is known.

The International Sunday School Lesson.

Third Quarter. Lesson IV. Isaiah lv, 1-13. July, 23, 1905

Copyright, Davis W. Clark.

The Gracious Invitation.

In the fifty third chapter, that "golden passional," the prophet has described the Great Shepherd's method of recovering His wayward flock, even by the sacrifice of His Son. He dwells upon the particulars of the vicarious death of Jesus, and, in closing, exults over the triumph of Him whose conquering was by love and suffering. In the fifty-fourth chapter, Isaiah describes the Church, her beauty, security, and capacity. In the fifty-fifth chapter he bursts out in a general and joyous invitation to the whole race to partake of the benefits of the atonement, and enjoy the security of the Church.

The prophet picks up (verse 1) the common street-cry of the water-vender, and turns it to the noblest use. He knows how inexhaustible are the riches of grace, when, without hesitation, he invites "every one" to partake. He has no inkling of a "select number," who only can accept his invitation. The "whosoever will" of the New Testament is the echo of this "Ho! every one," of the Old. "Buying without money,' is only a paradoxical way of emphasizing the freeness. Water, wine, and milk is a progressive scale to indicate the refreshing, exhilarating, and nourishing power of grace. But the sinner must be conscious of his need of salvation, and desire it, and come for it, as the thirsty man feels his thirst before he comes to the water-vender. And this consciousness of need (verse 2) comes with attention. The sinner must come, and bend forward to listen; he must hearken diligently. It is said of Peter after his denial of Jesus, "When he thought thereon, he went." If he had had no thoughts, he would have had no tears: Meditation is the threshold of penitence. He who stops to think is near the kingdom.

Those who partake of the atonement are joined to God (verse 3) in the new covenant, which includes the mercies assured in David's greater Son, who shall be (verse 4) the ideal witness, leader, and commander of the race—He shall witness to and teach men the way of salvation and duty, and shall, by His example and authority, lead them in it. The Redeemer's kingdom of grace (verse 5) shall sweep out to include nations not yet in existence, and others ignorant of the gospel shall show alacrity in accepting it when it is preached to them.

And it is supremely important that the gracious invitation of the gospel (verse 6) should be accepted immediately; that we should "hearken," "incline the ear," "hear," "buy," "eat," and "seek;" for there is coming a time when the Lord can not be "found" and will not be "near." The present life only is the period in which the provisions of the atonement avail. But in this life let the sinner forsake his wicked way and unrighteous thoughts; let him not only thus cease from evil, but let him do well in repentance toward God and faith in Christ, and God will not only have mercy, but will abundantly pardon. God's abundant pardon (verse 7) stands in contrast to man's illiberal forgiveness. God's thoughts and ways in general, and especially in the matter of forgiveness (verse 8, 9), are in marked contrast to man's; they are as wide asunder as heaven and earth.

And the process of grace in renewing the souls shall not be a whit less certain (verses 10, 11) than the processes of nature. As rain and snow do not return until they have accomplished the end for which they were sent, so certainly shall the blood spinkled from Calvary be effectual in the removing of sin from the penitent and believing.

Nature herself seems to be in sympathy (verses 12, 13) with the young convert. Mountains and hills break forth before him into singing, and all the trees of the field clap their hands. The transformation in his character and environment is as great as if the useful and beautiful fir had supplanted the poisonous and lacerating thorn, and the myrtle the brier.

The Teacher's Lantern.

Thirst is the fiercest, most importunate of physical appetites. It is here taken as the symbols of the soul's consciousness of need. Jesus joins hunger to thirst in His beatitude of the seeker after righteousness. It signifies alertness, persistency, use of means to end.

* * * * *

There is an undisguised note of assurance and complacency in the language of the prophet's invitation. He talks like one who had inexhaustible treasure at command.

* * * * *

The lavish hand of God is put in contrast with the grasping hand of the Oriental money-lender. God does things abundantly. The atmosphere of earth is seventy miles deep. Will it ever be breathed up? The oak shakes and enough acorns drop to plant a hundred forests. Will earth ever be denuded of its foliage? As in nature, so in grace! Enough for each, for all, for evermore!

* * * * *

There is certainty as well as abundance in nature. The seasons fail not. The planets move with divine precision. And this inviolable certitude of nature is but the reflection of Him who is eternally the same. From this sureness of nature the prophet argues the surenes of grace.

* * * * *

The prophet concludes with a high grace note of gladness, joy, peace, singing, clapping of hands.

* * * * *

But in the final analysis the sources of grace are not found external to one's self. There is not anywhere in the universe a mysterious reservoir of supply. "Do not say who shall go into heaven; that is to bring it down—or who shall go into the deep; that is to bring it up. But what saith the Scripture? The kingdom of God is within you."

* * * * *

The supply is subjective, not objective. Internal, not external. All the sources of a good life are already lodged in every human soul.

* * * * *

The first step in religion is one of discovery. One finds the possibility and power of a new life within. The next step is one of unfoldment. An evolution, easeless and divine, has begun.

The Religious Situation in the Philippines.

Contributed to this Paper by Prof. CHARLES E. HOYE, a Native Garrett Countian now in the Islands.

These Islands were conquered by Spanish soldiers before the English settlements in North America were begun, but the "friars" or priests, made the conquest secure by converting the people to Catholicism. This does not seem to have been difficult, as most of the people readily gave up their heathen superstitions and adopted the religion of their conquerers. Some of the wilder tribes, however, like Iggorotes, refused to accept Christianity, either at the hands of the priests or the point of the sword, and to this day there are about 200,000 uncivilized Pagans, living chiefly in the mountainous districts.

The warlike Moros of the southern islands, were not conquered until recent years and were really never governed by the Spaniards. They have never given up the religion of the Prophet, which was probably taught them by Arab missionaries about two hundred years before the Spaniards come. There are perhaps 500,000 Mohammedans in the Islands today and missionaries have little success in winning them to Christianity.

In Spanish times church and state were closely united and there was no freedom of religion as Americans understand it; few of the 30,000 Chinese became Christians and there were Mohammedans and Pagans, but these were tolerated only because the government could neither convert nor compel them to become Christians. Protestant churches were unknown: the English residents were twice refused permission to establish an Episcopal church. At present three denominations have both American and native congregations in separate churches in Manila, and the various Protestant bodies have divided the provinces into separate missionary fields and are working with some success.

In 1896 the great insurrection began. It was caused chiefly by the fact that Spanish priests not only controlled church affairs entirely, but also dominated the government, so that the local town governments, whose officials were natives, were really under the orders of the town priests.

The insurrection developed a desire for independence of all control by white people both in church and state. The American government put down the insurrection so far as state independence was concerned, but the people were given to understand that they were perfectly free in religious matters. Acting on this knowledge many of the native priests revolted, established the "Filipino Independent Catholic Church," in 1903 and chose as their leader, Gregorio Aglipay, "Archbishop."

This organization spread rapidly to most of the Islands and in many towns a majority of the people adhere to it. In ceremonies and belief it is similar to the parent church, but it refuses to recognize the authority of the Pope.

The different sects live in peace together. We hear of little trouble except when the Independents try to take possession of Catholic churches, which they claim belong to the people of the towns who built them, while the Romanists claim title to be vested in the church under the Archbishop. The courts have not yet decided the question and the rule of "actual possession" holds good in the case of both parties. An effort is being made by the Apostolic Delegate, now in the Islands, to bring the disaffected back to the mother church; the native priests wish to be appointed bishops. All bishops are now Americans. One of my native teachers expressed the main idea of the common people in this controversey when he said that "the Independent church is better for us because it is a Filipino church, not controlled by foreigners." The old independence idea you see.

Archbishop Harty, formerly of St. Louis, is probably the best man the Pope could have sent to reunite and reform the church here. He is comparatively young, kind and gentle, yet with firmness to stand by his principles.

In Pasay, near Manila, where the writer is stationed, the Roman Catholics hold the stone church and convent or priests house, and the Independents have built themselves a little chapel of bamboo and nipa leaves.

The Romans have a native priest, and a young English priest from Australia has recently been sent to assist him. We are glad to have this young man among us as he is very pleasant mannered and will doubtless do much good. A revolting native Catholic priest ministers to the Independents and perhaps one fourth of the population adhere to him. Protestant services are also conducted in the open air at intervals and there are a few adherents but no church building or resident minister.

The educational question, so far as the Catholic church is concerned, seems to be still unsettled. In Spanish times the town school with its two teachers, one for girls and one for boys, was practically under the direction of the town priest and religion was the chief subject taught. Our public school system now is entirely nonsectarian, though under the law any priest may teach or employ teachers to teach religion in the school house after the regular lessons.

I know of none, however, who have availed themselves of this privilege. In my town the Roman priest maintains in his house a school of one teacher and about sixty pupils who study religion, Spanish and Tagolog the native dialect; also in various parts of the town there are small similar classes taught usually by old women.

English is the only language taught in the government schools, but it is not taught in the so-called "private schools" because the "teachers" are too ignorant to learn it themselves.

These "church schools" in the provinces retard greatly the learning of English and the spread of intelligence generally among the people, because they are so poorly managed that the time of their pupils is largely wasted.

When our schools reopen in June I hope to be able to arrange with the English priests so that all children who desire may attend the public school in the forenoon and the church schools in the afternoon if they desire.

In our public schools in this town we have only one session a day of three and one half hours in the morning; in the afternoon the American supervising teacher teaches a class composed of the native teachers one and one half hours.

In this way I think both public and church instruction will prosper and the Catholic church here will not be accused of opposing and retarding the government policy of educating the people.

The Man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

The Borgia Bronze

By ROBERT C. V. MEYERS

Copyright, 1904, by Robert C. V. Meyers

THE week before starting for his usual Mediterranean sail Hartley took from the little gold inlaid desk in his wife's boudoir the letter of instructions. There had been a look of haunting sorrow in Elise's face the day she gave him the letter, and, as though reproaching herself for something, she urged his head down to her pillow and let his cheek rest close to hers for a moment before dismissing him.

When he left the room, her mother followed him.

"Elise has such strong individuality," said Mrs. Dale. "Her wishing to return to the original donors the pretty things she has had given her from time to time is just like her; it is the same as telling her friends that their gifts were precious to her and that it would seem almost sacrilegious for any one else to enjoy them after she is gone."

Hartley knew that the lady desired him to think that his wife put no intentional slight upon him in sending away from him her prized possessions.

But he had known the truth all along, ever since the day Elise accepted him, and he came upon her an hour after her word had been given him with an old bronze jar and Caldwell's letter in her lap. She was very white as she handed him the sheet, whereon he read the aspiring words of his rival. He gave her back the letter, looking into her eyes, and she threw it away from her, laughing lightly. Then he held out to her the case of shining adornments which he had been collecting for the day when she should have promised to be his wife, for he had never doubted that she would be his. A month later she married him.

He looked down at the letter of instructions spread out upon her dainty desk.

"The jewels my husband gave me," he read, "are to revert to him."

He smiled. Yesterday he had handed the baubles to her sister and been effusively thanked.

"So like you," Mrs. Dale said, "to wish Marguerite to have them. You know how dearly Elise appreciated them and how sweet it was of her to wish you to have them again. They were too valuable for her to dispose of otherwise. Besides, she loved you so."

The letter of instructions went on mentioning article after article, each to go back to the presenter of it, her wedding gifts and all, nothing to come to him but the jewels he gave her the day she consented to marry him.

"I purchased with a price," he said. "I gained a faithfulness up to the value I placed upon it, and she honored the name I gave her. There is nothing to complain about." And Caldwell's name was not among the others. How well she had guarded her poor secret, even speaking of the man as he forfeited the respect of his friends with a sort of pitying contempt which she must have tried to make believe was genuine.

No, Caldwell's name was not mentioned in the letter of instructions, and yet Caldwell had once given her a present.

He left the desk and, going to a cabinet in a corner, brought forth a low, squat vase of bronze.

Elise had told him the history of the bronze. It was called a poison jar. Caldwell had given it to her in Rome. It was said to have come from a Borgia collection, probably had been known to Lucrezia of that remarkable house.

Hartley fingered the dull, sinister looking thing, whose green and black blotches, etched by time, had engaged the encomiums of artists whom Elise had to the house. He turned it upside down and manipulated the base, lightly running his finger nail round it a score of times till it slowly revolved and disclosed a little compartment, the existence of which few would suspect.

SHE URGED HIS HEAD DOWN.

Out of this compartment Elise had abstracted Caldwell's letter of love that time he came upon her with the casket of jewels in his hand, an hour after she had said she would be his wife.

The place was vacant now—nothing there but a continuation of the canker that seared the outside.

What a romantic fellow Caldwell must have been! Quite an old time Elizabethan lover who feared his fate too much.

Why had Elise kept the bronze all this time? She had an artistic eye and admired its coloring.

Besides, had she not been wise in having no desire to revive old memories in Caldwell by sending the thing back to him?

There was one other thing she could have given back to Caldwell.

Hartley felt in his pocket and took out a paper folded and refolded till it was but an inch square. He fitted it in the compartment in the base of the bronze. It wedged in like a part of the metal. He had found it in a locket they took from his wife's neck when she was dead, a simple piece of jewelry her father had given her as a child and which she always wore in remembrance of him, for she had loved him. He had opened it and found the paper pressed over the portrait of her father.

He took the paper from the bronze jar. Ought it to have been buried with her, as was done with the locket? No; she had been his wife, and this was a love letter from another man.

Rather had she been cruel or kind to Caldwell or himself in showing the letter that time to her affianced husband, though could she have done otherwise when that accepted husband chanced upon her with the letter not yet hidden from him? And was he doing a loyal or kind thing to her in reading it a second time? There were hard lines about his mouth as his eyes scanned the hastily scrawled words: "I am poor, but you, too, are poor. Why must wealth be such a power and love be so defenseless? I love you as no man ever loved before. I will work for you, slave for you"—

He folded it again. Why had Elise kept it? And what a crazy idiot Caldwell must be to take a jilting as he had done, and scarcely a jilting either, for Elise had answered him not a word she would swear to that, for he knew Elise's honor), only accepting another man who spoke first. And Caldwell had gone down. What a wreck the man was, avoided by one time intimates, debasing his talents, welcoming the maddest excitement at no matter what cost to fame and conscience! And yet one friend remained to him, old Senator Nicholson, the friend of the president, the early chum of his father. Old Nicholson held out, offering his hand when others stood aloof. Only two days ago the papers announced the gaining of a consulship by Nicholson for Caldwell, which might yet save him and re-establish him in the good opinion of the world. And Caldwell had boasted at the club that he ignored the appointment. Could love do so much to debase a man?

Caldwell had been loved by Elise. The man had been weak enough to let himself sink because he thought his feeling had not been reciprocated by her.

"But am I strong enough to let another man know how little I was prized? And yet"—

If Caldwell were set on his feet again and accepted the consulship!

"But Elise does not mention his name in the letter of instructions. Did not her feeling for him wear away when she discovered how weak he was? Still she kept his letter, and it is the province of a woman to elevate what she loves. What she loves!"

Suddenly he wheeled toward the gold inlaid desk and let down the lid. He could not write the letter at Elise's desk.

He took the bronze jar and left the rosy room, locking the door behind him, and passed on to the library. There he threw the curtains wide, letting in the sunshine, and, seating himself in his accustomed chair, wrote and addressed a few lines to Caldwell.

Caldwell was at the club when the note was handed to him. He was at his worst.

He opened Hartley's note. He burst into a strident laugh. Mrs. Hartley wished to return to the original donors all the gifts with which they had honored her, and, among others, his old time remembrance had been noticed. That jar! He recollected the day in Rome, the lying old descendant of the Caesars who sold the thing to him. Elise had admired it in the little black shop window, its shape and its color. They had passed on to the great cathedral, where Mrs. Dale awaited them and dismissed him. He had hurried back to the little shop to buy the bronze, which the old fellow lovingly displayed to him, vouching for its antiquity and showing him the hollow in the base. It seemed that a great chance opened to him. Mrs. Dale's treatment of him in the cathedral told him that her daughter would see him no more alone. Elise had besought him to send her no more letters, which her mother insisted upon opening. Hartley had arrived and been welcomed by Mrs. Dale. He bought the jar and in the hollow wedged his letter of adoration, fearful, yet hopeful. He sent the bronze to Elise, was assured that it was placed in her hand and never heard a word from her. The next month she was married to Hartley.

So Elise would have him receive his gift back? That told him even at this late day how little she had ever cared for him, how false she had been from the first. She had kept the jar, undesirous of holding any communication with him by sending it back to him, and Hartley knew of the thing and would return it now. Curse the man! He should have nothing that had once been his. He would go for the bronze. He would go at once.

In half an hour he was on the way to Elise's former home. Hartley received him in the library.

Caldwell's head was high, his bloodshot eyes like those of an animal at bay. He noted Hartley's lack of funereal garb and thought how little the man had cared for his wife, for he looked well, positively calm and easy, and she had not been dead a month.

There were few words between them.

"I owed it to the nature of your note," Caldwell said, "to answer it at once and in this way."

He knew his speech was weak and that it so impressed the other.

Hartley nodded and pointed to the little jar on the table. At that moment he could have struck the man down, the marks of dissipation on him were such a blur on Elise's memory. Call that love? Love should ennoble, not debase.

Yet Elise might save this man. He owed it to the love he bore the memory of his wife that Caldwell should not blame her further.

"That is yours, I believe," he said, again indicating the bronze. Caldwell was searching in his mind for words for the widower.

"You have," he said stiltedly, "sustained a great loss."

Hartley's face reddened, but, "Loss is common," he said quietly enough.

"Yes," quickly followed up Caldwell, "'never morning wore to evening but some heart did break,' the poet says."

It pleased him to be vulgarly flippant, to make the cold man in front of him wince.

"It takes a good deal to break a heart," returned Hartley, and Caldwell smiled at the stab, as he thought it.

"Your wife," he said, "suffered little, I hope."

"Her physicians so assured me," answered Hartley.

A little silence ensued, which neither seemed willing to break. At length Caldwell spoke.

"Shall you take your yacht across this summer?" he asked.

"I do so every year," was the response.

"I fancied," Caldwell said, "that the loss you have had"—

"Might change my plans?" interrupted Hartley. "I sail next week. And now I shall thank you for coming in person in response to my note concerning Mrs. Hartley's letter of instructions. Shall I send the bronze to you?"

HARTLEY'S HAND CLOSED.

"On second thought," said Caldwell, "I believe I will not take it. I care very little for it, and—that is, you may make whatever disposition of it you please."

The wretchedness of the speech struck Hartley. Had the man cared anything for Elise, after all? If he had not, then not for the world should he have the bronze.

But Caldwell's eyes were on the little jar. His mind swung back to the old days in Rome, Elise by his side. Again he was bartering with the shopkeeper for the jar, saw the little aperture where poison was said to have been once concealed, and in that aperture he had crushed his wild declaration of love.

"No," he said; "I will take it," and placed his hand on it.

But Hartley's hand closed over his hotly. For a moment the men looked fiercely into each other's eyes.

"Elise!" Hartley's lips murmured mutely; "Elise!" And his fingers relaxed. Caldwell caught up the bronze.

"I hope," he said, "your usual trip abroad will hold its usual distractions." And he was gone, leaving Hartley in his chair, his gaze fastened on the spot where the bronze had rested.

His face was white and drawn. His fingers tightly clutched the arms of the chair.

"Elise!" he murmured; "Elise!"

Caldwell went along the streets in wildest humor. He had been to the man Elise had chosen in his stead. He had his revenge. Elise's husband had never cared for her, and she had been a woman who craved love.

He tossed the bronze from hand to hand. He would further humiliate her memory. He would give the silly jar to some besotted passerby, some humble, poverty stricken soul who would at once dispose of the thing for a few cents with which to buy liquid warmth and wealth. But he reached the club before doing so. He got into an untenanted alcove in the reading room and set the jar before him on the table. Only a little while ago! And this was the end! Oh, those days in Rome! Those days in Rome!

"And what a fool I was!" He took up the bronze.

"How did old Ananias say was the way to get at the secret?"

He fingered the base of the jar.

"'Loss is common,'" he laughed. "'Never morning wore to evening but some heart did break.'"

And old Nicholson! He would write at once, declining the consular appointment.

See, here was the almost imperceptible threadlike groove in the bottom of the jar! You ran your finger nail lightly round it till you heard a faint click.

Could it be possible the old dago had told the truth and that this thing had been a poison jar?

Poison! Love was a poison, insidious, deadly.

He heard a faint click. The base of the bronze in his hand slowly revolved till it hinged round and showed the interior of the false bottom.

He gasped. A paper folded and folded till it was an inch square lay there. He dared not touch it.

He trembled from head to foot. Elise's voice was in his ears. He saw her face. Suddenly he reached and drew out the paper. He cried out and tore at it and spread it open.

It was his old declaration of love.

He gazed at it for a moment; then pushed it to his heart.

Had she never found it—never guessed at it?

No, she had never discovered the secret of the jar. Hartley had come with his specious wealth, her mother was anxious for the match, Elise had thought she was the sport of the poorer man—she had treasured this little bronze, the one gift he had ever offered her. She never knew; she had loved him, she had loved him. And, oh, to reclaim himself for sake of her love and his! For she loved him, she loved him, she loved him!

And he, too, murmured her name: "Elise!"

EXCURSIONS TO THE WEST

To the Pacific Coast—to California, Oregon, Washington—round-trip, long transit and return limits, liberal stop-over privileges.
The rate is practically on the basis of one fare for the round trip. Of course, if you wish to visit both California and Oregon or Washington, the cost is slightly more.
These reduced rates are in effect on certain dates in months of May to October, inclusive. They apply from all Eastern points via Chicago, St. Louis or Memphis gateways. The Rock Island System will take you up in either Chicago or St. Louis, or at hundreds of other Middle West points and carry you to the Coast in through Standard or Tourist Sleepers with unexcelled Dining Car service. The Rock Island also affords a choice of routes: on the "Scenic" route you can stop off in Colorado—see Salt Lake City—visit Yellowstone National Park; on the "Southern" route you can go via El Paso, thence [illegible], then "up coast" to San Francisco and on to Portland or Puget Sound if desired.
In short, these excursions offer an unusually good chance to see our country in a comprehensive manner.
If you desire to go only as far as Colorado, there are excursion rates in effect to that section and return, all summer long, specially reduced June 30 to July 4, August 12 and 13, and August 30 to September 4. Extension trips to Ogden or Salt Lake and return at low cost also.
From September 15 to October 31, 1905, one-way tourist or "colonist" tickets will be on sale to California and the Pacific Northwest—about half regular fare.
If interested, send name and address on this coupon, designating which booklet wanted and to what point you plan to go. Name probable date of start also, so we can advise definitely with respect to rates, etc.

Betty Seers, Understudy

By ETHEL BARRINGTON

Copyright, 1905, by Ethel Barrington

"Will nothing change you?" Bob Deering's voice was almost tragic, but it made little impression on Betty.

"I've signed a contract!" she cried, waving the document before his bewildered eyes. "I am to report for rehearsal next week. I'm an understudy. That is the technical term. I play when the leading woman doesn't."

"It seems so—so indecent that you should work when I am simply foolish with money. Consider what a cad I must feel, consider"—

"Bobby, you are the dearest of chums, but you are dense at times. A girl could not marry for money!"

"It's not unheard of," suggested Deering.

"I'm thinking of nice girls—myself, for instance."

"I asked you while you had plenty," he offered by way of excuse.

"Of course you did. You always do the correct thing. But I refused you, so it would look mercenary to take you now. Bob, you must understand. It is a sort of crisis with me. I want to work, to be self supporting. Father's death and our other losses ought to make a woman of me. I shall not be less desirable then if some day"—

"I hope the time will come before work and disappointment eat the sunshine out of your heart!" And Robert

"I MUST APOLOGIZE UNDER THE CIRCUMSTANCES"—

Deering, multimillionaire, went home convinced that at times money is a drawback.

When George Seers, Betty's father, had died suddenly no one had suspected that he was financially crippled. But such had proved the case. His widow had found herself bereft of everything, but she had cared only as it had affected her daughter. They had moved into a tiny flat and practiced rigid economy. Mrs. Seers had believed it only a passing phase for Betty. Deering's devotion was well known, and she approved of him.

Then suddenly Betty had announced her determination to join the army of independent women and become a wage earner. She had kept her plans to herself, fearing that her efforts might prove fruitless. As an amateur actress she had won recognition, so, naturally, it was to the stage that she turned in her need. After anxious days of uncertainty she obtained the coveted contract. She was engaged at a small salary to understudy a prominent actress, then playing a successful engagement in the city.

"Just think, Muzzie, could anything be easier? Night and matinee I report, one hour before the play, remain awhile and then come home, earning thereby on Saturdays a fat envelope to meet the bills."

"You are such a featherbrain. You will tire of work and lose Bob with your whims."

Betty made a grimace. "Do you think I could? I'd appreciate him more if I believed it possible. Bob is so hopelessly—mine."

The next week Betty's occupation began. In the morning she attended rehearsal and spent long hours in being drilled and coached by an irascible stage manager. In the afternoon she studied by herself. When she had mastered the lines perfectly she commenced reporting at each performance. At first she felt her importance. But as the weeks passed into months, and the leading woman remained unnaturally healthy, doubts of her own usefulness discouraged the girl. The only comfort was the "envelope." She missed her friend and—Bob. She had not seen or heard anything of him in two months.

One afternoon as she brooded over these things Deering entered as though there had been no lapse of time.

"Oh, Bob—Bob"— If Deering had absented himself for a purpose it was answered in Betty's glad cry. He looked supremely happy.

"Now you just must come to dine with me," he declared. The invitation was accepted. Deering, Betty and her mother were soon seated at a cozy table in a fashionable hotel.

"How good it tastes," cried Betty. "It's so long since I've really dined." Her spirits ran riot, her eyes grew bright as they had not been for days. Deering beamed with satisfaction. They talked sense as though it were nonsense, and nonsense seriously, both ridiculously happy.

"I've a box for Mrs. Fiske. You will both come?"

"After reporting," agreed Betty, remembering duty.

"Report what? Where?"

"At the theater. I'm understudy, you know. But it won't take long. I go about 7 or half past."

"Seven or half past," repeated Deering. "Well, it's too late now!"

"What will they say"— Betty hesitated.

"Nothing. Just tip the doorkeeper to say you called."

"Doorkeeper! It's the stage manager, and he is a bear."

What harm could it do to miss one night when she had reported for three months?

After the theater they went to supper. Betty had long forgotten everything but the passing moment. A friend stopped to exchange greetings.

"And where have you been tonight?" inquired Betty.

"Nowhere. Had tickets for the ——, but the leading woman was taken suddenly ill, and they closed the theater. Jolly strange they had no understudy!" Then, bowing, he rejoined his friends.

"Oh, oh," gasped Betty when she could get her breath, "the understudy is here!" Then she laughed hysterically. "I a business woman! And at the first taste of pleasure I forgot everything!"

"It's my fault," protested Deering contritely.

"The manager won't recognize your responsibility, and he never gave you an envelope"—

"A what?"

"They'll discharge me! What shall I do?" There were tears in Betty's eyes.

"Enter into another engagement," suggested Deering promptly, "one where you can't get your notice, where you won't be understudy, but the real thing."

The next day the manager sat at his desk when the office boy brought him a card. "Send her away. I'm busy," commanded the manager angrily.

"But it's most important," pleaded Betty, slipping past the boy. "I don't suppose you will forgive me"—

"It was so unprofessional that I have nothing to say, Miss Seers."

"Mrs. Deering," interpolated Betty—"Mrs. Robert Deering." The name was well known. The manager turned to listen.

"You see, my husband"—Betty almost tripped on the word—"feels it was his fault. We were married last night. His lawyer will settle whatever monetary loss you sustained. He thinks I'm cheap at that price. But for myself I must apologize. Under the circumstances"—

"I wish you every happiness," said the manager gallantly.

"Thanks!" cried Bob, appearing in the doorway. "I want to shake hands too. Her fear of you won me my wife."

THE TEACHERS TO LEND THEIR AID

In the Battle Which Maryland Scientists Are Waging Against Consumption.

The first definite appeal to the school teachers of Maryland to join in the campaign of education concerning the dread disease consumption was made to them at the meeting of State Teacher's Association at Blue Mountain House, last week, when Dr. John S. Fulton, secretary of the State Board of Health, and during the absence in Europe of Dr. Henry Barton Jacobs the acting president of the Maryland Association for the Prevention and Relief of Tuberculosis, spoke to the educators of the state and asked them to help to cut down the death rate of tuberculosis.

Dr. Fulton said in part:

"Tuberculosis bacillus is one of the weakest in the whole category of disease producing germs. Hardly any disease germ is less fit to live outside the animal body. And yet it has fastened itself on the animal world and become the greatest among the cause of untimely death. By sheer force of numbers, the most insignificant individual among man's enemies has gained preeminence.

The prevention of tuberculosis depends, above all things, on the enlightment of the people concerning nature and cause of the disease and the simple means by which it may be prevented. A large voluntary association can bring about an enlightened public opinion much faster than any official agency, and this is the reasen for the existence of the Maryland Association for the Prevention and Relief of Tuberculosis.

The interest of teachers in the problems of tuberculosis is no greater than the interest of other professional and business people, but your interest in the subject is different, and its difference makes the tuberculosis problem one of definite and practical concern to you.

The seed is now sown for consumption's harvest of death in the next seven years. If we move fast and intelligently enough we can save a few of those now marked for death in 1907 and 1908 a few more if we stand idle, will surely die of tuberculosis in 1911 and 1912. The saving of these people is no particular concern of yours, except so far as this company will have its share in that roll of untimely death. The people who are going to realize the first material profit of this popular campaign against tuberculosis are your wards at this moment, and they will escape the doom now impending in proportions as you know and can oppose the dangers now surrounding them, and in proportion as you can inform their minds and their wills to take care of themselves after you are through with them."

The instruction of each teacher in the state, in the simple matters necessary to the education of the children of the state is now being arranged for by State Superintendent M. Bates Stevens, and the county Superintendents. It is probable that at least one peiod at each county institute in Maryland, this fall, will be devoted to discussion of the subject of tuberculosis.

PAUL JONES ON AMERICAN SOIL.

Remains in Temporary Vault at Naval Academy.

FRENCH SAILORS TAKE PART

Coffin Landed With Honors—All Annapolis Looks On—Simple But Solemn Ceremonies—Taps Sounded at the Close—A round of Salutes.

Annapolis, July 25—John Paul Jones, the hero of the American Navy, now rests in the United States Naval Academy reservation. His body was placed to a temporary vault yestercay morning, and will be guarded day and night by sentinels until it is removed to its permanent abode in the crypt in the new chapel, which will probably be completed within one year.

Imposing ceremonies, impressive and at the same time spectacular, marked the second interment of the famous sea fighter who died in Paris on July 18, 1792, and was buried in an obscure cemetery. The story of the identification of his remains last spring and the subsequent event connected with bringing them across the Atlantic with the great escort of warships has already been told.

It was 10.13 o'clock yesterday morning when the body reached the American shore, although it had been in American waters since Saturday. It was received by an escort of 1000 men, including officers and men of Rear Admiral Sigsbee's and Davis' fleets and midshipmen and marines from the Naval Academy. Possibly half an hour was consumed in transferring it to the temporary tombs, where brief service of the Episcopal Church were read by Rev. Henry Howard Clark, chaplain of the Naval Academy. After the body was placed in the vault a company of marines fired three volleys over it and a bugler sounded taps.

All Annapolis that could get away from business or domestic duties witnessed the ceremonies. Aside from the residents of the town and of the Naval Academy, a score or more of newspaper correspondents and an army of camera fiends, there were few other spectators. Word had gone forh thatt the exercises would be simple, and that the ostentatious part of the program would be carried out when the removal is made to the crypt in the chapel.

All flags were at half-mast. This applied to the warships and to every launch and cutter or craft of any kind that belonged to the Government. Neither Governor Warfield nor any official of any State was asked to take part, but they may be invited for the final obsequies.

The background of the picture was white. All of the officers of the navy, the marines and sailors were in white. The pretty women of the residential and naval sets wore white. Only three dashes of color relieved the monotony. One was in the uniforms of the Naval Academy Band, crimson coats, blue trousers with broad red stripes, and the other was in the uniforms of the French sailors from the cruiser Jurien de la Graviere, who wore light blue blouses, with white trousers. Their caps and red topknots in the shapes of rosettes. The other bit of color was in the flag that covered the casket.

About 7.30 o'clock the Government tug Standish left her moorings and made for the flagship Brooklyn. She drew up alongside and the body of the Admiral was put aboard the tug. It is in the original lead cast in which it was recovered in in Paris, and this casket is enclosed in a second case of hard wood, with silver handles. It is very heavy, and taxed the strength of the eight sailors who lifted it.

Covering the outside case was the American flag sent to Paris by the Daughters of the American Revolution when Admiral Sigsbee went abroad to bring the remains to the United States.

BY UNCLE JAY BEE.

Streams in the South.

These words of David—126th Psalm— are not understandable without some knowledge of natural phenomena in Central Africa.

Around the headwaters of the great river Nile is a vast basin, drained by different streams running ocean ward. During part of the year there is here a "rainy season," when there is a prodigious rainfall all over this section. In this way all the country is filled up with water: the streams not being able to carry off the vast and continous precipitation.

Suddenly this rainfall ceases, and the tropical sun beats down with an intense energy. Not a cloud may now be seen for weeks, and the evaporation is copious as was the precipitation awhile before. Presently, now, the strange words in the 4th verse of this Psalm have their explanation: "The waters flow backward." The sun drinks up the great flood more rapidly than the rivers can carry them off, and the streams turn backward.

And here is a lesson for us. Sometimes God's showers of blessing comes in such vast profusion as to lead us to think we must be Heaven's favorites: blessings come 'til literally we have not room to contain. So we feel rich: we are full and lay us down at ease, never counting that other lands may be thirsty, even perishing, and in sore need of our superebundance. Were we but concerned to open up channels choken by sloth, the stagment stores around us would flow out in blessings to others. Jeshurun-like, we wax fat and kick.

Now comes a reverse visitation. His wrath is kindled to retribution; the heat of this anger consumes our plenty. Back to His heavenly storehouses he calls his favors. the streams turn backward, and we are parched.

Rural Service Completed in Guernsey County.

Mr. A. F. George, special agent of the Postoffice Department, who has been engaged in completing a rural mail system for this county, completed his work Tuesday and left for Athens county to do similar service. Mr. George commenced his work in February, but has not worked continuously, having attended to matters claiming his attention in other localities at several times. When his work is accepted by the department, which will be done, Guernsey county will have a complete rural service. Mr. George is a competent and industrious representative of the Government and his work will be found to be as near complete and perfect as it is possible to make it in a county like Guernsey. Mr. George is a pleasant, courteous gentleman and the postmasters with whom he has had business during his stay in the county became very much attached to him. —Rep. Press, Cambridge, Ohio.

Mr. W. McCulloh Brown, of District No 8, was in Oakland Tuesday in the interests of his candidacy for the State Senate. Mr. Brown feels highly gratified with the support promised him in various sections of the county and considers his prospects bright for the nomination.

GAME OF BALL MONDAY.

Alta's of Terra Alta, and the Oakland Nine, Have Scrappy Game.

Monday afternoon the fourth of a series of games between the Oakland and Terra Alta nines was played on the grounds here which resulted in a score of ten to fourteen in favor of the local nine.

The game was hard fought from start to finish and at one time looked as though a "rough house" was imminent owing to a decision of one of the umpires on a strike made by a batter of the home team, but the matter was smoothed over and the game continued without more than the ordinary amount of hot air with the result as above stated.

DIED.

MICKEY.—At her home in Gorman, this county, on Saturday last after a protracted illness of several months, of tuberculosis, Mrs Lillian Gertrude Mickey, wife of Station Agent E. H. Mickey at Gormania, aged twenty-four years, six months and twenty-six days. Mrs. Mickey was born at Independence, W. Va., on December 26th, 1880. The deceased leaves to mourn the loss of a loving wife and mother a husband and one son, besides her father, mother, a a sister and brother. The funeral occurred Sunday morning at ten-thirty from the Gorman Methodist Episcopal church, of which the deceased was a consistent member, she also being a member of the choir of the same church, and was an untiring worker in all church affairs and instrumental in building up this church some years ago. Hers was the first funeral to occur from this church since its erection. The services were conducted by Rev. E. Westfall, the pastor assisted by the Rev. Mr. Patterson, of the Presbyterian church. The pall bearers were Thomas Little, Chas. Newman, Chas. E. Hilleary, Chas. Wolf, A. F. Schwartz and James Chisholm, all members of Oakland Lodge No. 192, A. F. and A. M. of which Mr. Mickey is also a member. The floral tributes were many and beautiful, numerous handsome designs having been contributed by friends of the family. A sadly beautiful feature of the obsequies was the music rendered by the choir. The remains were laid to rest in the M. E. cemetery in the presence of a large concourse of sorrowing relatives and friends of the deceased, it being one of the largest funerals ever occuring at that place.

MARRIED.

RIZER—FAIRALL.—On Sunday evening, July 23, 1905, at the parochial residence by Rev. James E. Connell, Mr. Lawrence Rizer, of Keyser, and Miss Rose Fairall, of Oakland. After the ceremony a reception was tendered and refreshments served at the residence of Mr. R. S. Jamison, uncle of the bride, to a number of relatives and friends. The couple left Oakland Sunday night for Keyser, where they are guests of the groom's parents, and will return to Oakland the last of this week. Mr. Rizer is an excellent young man. The bride has many friends in Oakland all of whom wish her a long and happy life.

MUSE AND MATRIMONY

By T. SHERWOOD BOYD

Copyright, 1905, by T. C. McClure

"Do you know," remarked Gerald Goodsell, "I think I shall take to writing poerty."

Nettie Ainsworth gave a little laugh as she settled herself more comfortably in the big chair. "Who ever heard of a poet with a waist line larger than his chest measurement?" she teased.

"I say," he cried, "I'm not to blame because I'm—er—plump—am I?"

"You're not to blame, Gerry," she laughed, "but you cannot have indigestion and the fires of genius within you at the same time."

"But I have a splendid digestion," he persisted. "Four meals a day never feaze me."

"Poets," counseled Nettie, "never have regular meals. When they lead regular lives they cease to become geniuses."

"But that's all tommyrot," he declared loftily. "I can be a genius and have the comforts of life, can't I?"

"If you are a very great genius, Gerry, you may be able to live those handicaps down, but few men write good checks and good verse at the same time."

"Well," he said stubbornly, "I don't think my checks would be protested, and I write verse. Bob Thompson said they were first rate. I read him some the other night."

"So that is what he meant," mused Miss Ainsworth.

"What's what who meant?" demanded Gerald.

"Why, Bob said he had been to see you the other evening and had had one of the best laughs he has enjoyed in a long time," she explained.

"He told me they were good."

"No," explained Nettie. "I think you will find that he said they were great."

"It's the same thing."

"'Great' is a word capable of a wider latitude of definition," she reminded him. "Read me some of the verses."

"You'll laugh," he contended.

"No," she promised; "I'll be very good and quiet."

"Here's one I thought up last night," he began bashfully:

"My lady's eyes are blue and kind,
Her charms are charms of face and mind,
Her equal would be hard to find;
'Tis she I love most dearly.
My lady's face is pure and sweet,
My lady's hair is dainty, neat,
And trim her tiny little feet,
And she's an angel—nearly."

"I think that last line needs a little polishing," said Miss Ainsworth gravely. "The lady of the lines might object to being called a near angel."

"I say," cried Gerald in shocked tones, "you don't suppose I meant that, do you? That's poetic license—to make the rhyme, you know."

"Suppose you make it, 'And she's an angel, clearly?'" suggested Nettie. "That would be more polite."

Gerry's face brightened. "It's awfully good of you to suggest that," he said. "It's a whole lot better."

"Is there a second verse?" asked Nettie.

"Not yet," admitted Gerry, coloring. "You see, the different verses should be alike in meter. Now, when I start a second verse it sounds different. I had a second verse to this. It goes:

"I never loved another girl
With half the tender passion
That keeps my head all in a whirl
In this unusual fashion.
If she would only give her love
To one who loves her dearly,
I'd think the stars in heaven above
Like her eyes shone more clearly."

He paused expectantly. Miss Ainsworth admitted that the verses were scarcely of the same metrical measurement.

"I think," observed Gerry, "that I'll have the verse done in a booklet where there is only one verse to every other page and the rest of the paper is covered with pictures. Then, you see, it would not matter so much."

"You should be an inventor, Gerry," counseled Miss Ainsworth. "I think you are more ingenious than poetical."

"But I want to be a poet," he protested. "I've got such a lot of things that I dare not say to the girl herself. It's the only way to let them come out."

Nettie smiled. "Now it all comes out," she declared. "Who is the lady, Gerry?"

"I cannot tell you," said Goodsell, his face crimsoning. "You see, if I could get up the nerve to tell you her name I wouldn't have to write this stuff."

"Why don't you write her a proposal in rhyme?"

"Didn't I try?" he groaned. "I put in three weeks before St. Valentine's trying to find a rhyme for her name."

"Now," announced Miss Ainsworth triumphantly, "I know where one of my valentines came from."

"Rotten, wasn't it?" he asked despairingly.

"Well," she admitted, "you might have found a better rhyme for my name than 'let he.'"

"I worked four hours to get that," he asserted. "You try it and see how hard it is."

She went to the table and scribbled on the fly leaf of a book. Then she brought it to him.

Your name might be Eva or Grace
Or Agnes or Annie or Letty,
But it's not, and I'll make a brave race
For the love of the fair lady Nettie.

"See how easy it is?" she demanded as he looked up.

"I can do it myself now," he announced as he in turn moved toward the table. Presently he returned to the fireplace. "Read this, please," he said as he handed her the sheet. On the other side of the paper she read:

Her hair may be blond, black or red,
Her name may be Hettie or Detty,
But the girl I am anxious to wed
Is a brunette, and her name is Nettie.

"That's what I've been trying to say to you for most two years," he went on earnestly. "It may be bad verse, but I think I'll make a better husband than I will a poet. Say 'Yes,' dear," he urged.

And Nettie said, "Yes, dear," so softly that he had to kneel beside her, with his arms about her, to catch the whispered words.

Locomotive Fielded Ball.

In the baseball annals of Texas, Baltimore county, is an incident which, whether an actual occurrence or not, has been repeated so often that it is invested with the force of fact.

On a hot Fourth of July back in the eighties, when the catcher held his position behind the bat without a mask and the pitcher knew of no curve or toe plate, there was a game of ball between the Texas Sluggers and the Timonium Little Potatoes, but Hard to Peel. The Sluggers had got in some good stick work early in the game, and the visitors were just feeling the big Texas pitcher. It was the fifth inning, and the Little Potatoes had two men on the bases, one on second and the other on first, when one of their home run hitters, who had been asleep until this moment, struck the ball. It cleared the entire field and would have fallen on the railroad track, but just at that moment a train came along, and the ball disappeared in the smokestack of the engine. The train was going at a lively speed up grade, and the force of the puffs ejected the ball. The momentum of the train carried it until it fell in the third baseman's hands, and a double play was the result. After much kicking from the Little Potatoes as to whether the play was fair the side was retired, as the double play made three hands out.—Baltimore Sun.

The Polite Burglars.

It is said that even the most gentlemanly of our burglars have much to learn from Japan in the way of politeness, if one may judge by a description of the manners of robbers in that country. Three men broke into a dyer's house while he was away, and one of them gently asked the wife how much money there was in the place. She answered that there was just a little in the house. The robber laughed and said:

"You are a good old woman, and we believe you. If you were poor we would not rob you at all. Now, we only want some money and this," placing his hand on a fine silk dress.

The old woman replied: "All my husband's money I can give you, but I beg you will not take that, for it does not belong to my husband and was confided to us only for dyeing. What is ours I can give, but I cannot give what belongs to another."

"That is quite right," approved the robber, and he immediately withdrew with his confederates.

The Planet Mars.

"I am certain Mars is inhabited," said Camille Flammarion, "and probably by people much more advanced than we are. The year in Mars is twice as long as ours—that is to say, it really consists of 730 days. The public at large does not really know the precision of some of our astronomical observations. Thus we know the length of the day in Mars by diurnal rotation to the one-thousandth part of a second, and from observations, which have now extended over 100 years, we find the length of the day on the planet is 24 hours 37 minutes 22 seconds. The climate of the Martians is very mild; there are no gales, while the atmosphere is very light, with scarcely any clouds. The inhabitants enjoy fine weather, the climate being dry and clear. We know the globe of Mars perfectly; in fact, far better than the earth."

The Word "Invention."

The old, general meaning of the word "invention" seems strange to modern eyes and ears. "Invention" signifies simply "finding," though the meaning of discovery has been specialized away from it in modern speech. Thus Hooker wrote of "that judicial method which seemeth best for the invention of truth." When Burton wrote of "the invention of a geometrical problem" he meant its solution. In the seventeenth century the circulation of the blood was described as "the best and most useful invention of this latter age," and in the eighteenth century Dr. Willis was referred to as "the first inventor of the nervous system."

Bowser Has A Day Off

He Fails to "Perform," and Mrs. B., Who Knows Him of Old, Is Worried.

IN EXCELLENT HUMOR.

But the Strain Is Too Much, and Next Morning He Is Back at His Old Tricks Again.

[Copyright, 1905, by R. B. McClure.]

WHEN breakfast had been concluded the other morning Mr. Bowser lighted a cigar and sauntered out into the back yard to see how many clothespins were getting ready to blossom with the crocuses, and at the end of half an hour Mrs. Bowser called from one of the back windows:

"Won't you be late at the office this morning?"

"I am going to take a day off," was his quiet reply.

Mrs. Bowser's knees began to shake. His day off meant that he would want to overhaul the house from top to bottom, and he would be almost certain to meddle with the water pipes and gas meter and bring about some sort of calamity. She went about with pal-pitating heart for the next thirty minutes, but when she looked out again she was somewhat relieved to find him seated on an old wash bench and stroking the cat in a fatherly way. Now and then he glanced upat the chimneys and the roof as if making a mental calculation, but at 10 o'clock he shifted around on to the front steps and settled down as if he meant to stay there. She presently made an excuse to get out there and inquire:

"Have you got a headache this morning?"

"Not the slightest."

"Does your rheumatism bother you?"

"Not a bit."

"I—I have put my house cleaning off to next month. The weather is so very uncertain, you know."

"I guess you are wise."

She could think of nothing more, and she left him, but as she went about doing the upstairs work she kept a general eye on him from an open window. It was not long before a man came along and halted at the gate to say:

"Why, Bowser, you home? I was thinking of going over to the office to see you. I know where you can get an auto for half price."

"Don't want it, thank you."

"But it's a clipper, and the price has been cut in two."

"Don't want it."

"Aren't you feeling yourself today?"

"Never felt better."

The man made some remark about the weather and passed on. On the corner he met the coal man and said:

"You know Bowser, of course? What in thunder ails him?"

"How—why?"

"I was just talking to him. He seems to be loafing around home today. I offered him an auto at half price and he turned me down."

"He did, eh? Well, I haven't seen him for four or five days, but if he refused to grab for that auto then you can bet he's getting wrong in the head. I've always said that he'd have softening of the brain some time."

Meanwhile, down at the house, a potato peddler had come along. He knew that Mr. Bowser had thrown three of the profession over the fence within a year and told the cook he'd discharge her if she even bought a turnip of them, but the sight of his enemy sitting on the top step so calmly and complacently and looking so harmless in the eyes of all emboldened him to stop his rig at the curb and to say over the gate:

"Judge, can I sell you a few 'taters today? I've got a load of boss ones here."

The words floated up to Mrs. Bowser and gave her a chill. She was getting ready to run downstairs to prevent a tragedy when she heard Mr. Bowser reply:

"I hardly think we need any potatoes today. Thank you for calling my attention to them. They do look nice."

"I've got some fine cabbages here."

"Yes, they are fine, but I guess I don't want any."

"How about beets?"

"No beets, thank you. Call again as you come along tomorrow."

Mr. Bowser's attitude not only made Mrs. Bowser gasp for breath, but the peddler turned pale and mounted his wagon and got around the nearest corner as fast as he could. There he met another of his kind coming from the opposite direction and shouted to him:

"Say, if you turn into Third place, look out for old Bowser."

"Why?"

"He's home and sitting on the steps, and he tried his best to lure me inside the gate by talking soft. Say, if I'd gone in he would have tossed me ten feet high. You beware of him unless you want to leave a widow behind you."

Between that hour and 12 o'clock Mr. Bowser encountered an old man, a boy distributing bills and a mender of tinware, and his reception of them was so kind and gentle that Mrs. Bowser told the cook to have lunch on the very minute and to hold herself in readiness to run the instant she heard any strange rumbles. At the lunch table she asked:

"You were not thinking of painting the house today, were you?"

"No, dear."

"Nor of fixing the water pipes, nor anything?"

"No."

When lunch was over, he stood around for awhile, and then, putting on his hat, he strolled over to the butcher's. As he never entered the shop except to kick, the butcher began to bristle up and get ready for a row. None came, however. Instead of a kick Mr. Bowser softly observed:

"I have noticed such an improvement in the meat during the last three months that I thought I'd drop in and tell you how pleased and satisfied I am. If every one had as conscientious a butcher as you are things would run smoother."

"Bowser, do you mean it?" asked the butcher as he wondered if he had heard aright.

"Of course I mean it."

"Then shake. I have said that you were a chronic kicker, but I take all back."

From the butcher shop Mr. Bowser went over to the drug store. He and the druggist had given each other many a hard rub, and as the latter caught sight of him through the window he said to his clerk:

"There comes that old kicker, Bowser. Wonder what the devil he is home this time of day for? If he gives me any of his chin music I'll order him out."

He didn't have to proceed to that extremity. Mr. Bowser sauntered in with a smile on his face, and after asking for a cent's worth of slippery elm he said:

"Grimshaw, I don't know but you've got the impression that I'm a sort of kicker."

"Well, you are a little eccentric."

"That's all, and that's only when my sciatica bothers me. I have repeatedly recommended you as the best druggist in town and shall take pleasure in continuing to do so."

Thence he went to the coal office. Every week he had been in the habit of telling the coal man that he was cheating on the weight. He now meant to drop in and apologize. Unfortunately the coal man was out, but word was left with his clerk, and Mr. Bowser returned home. From 1:30 to 3 o'clock he lay on the lounge and dozed.

From 3 to 4 he smoked and read.

From 4 to 6 he sat on the front steps and let street fakirs yell at him and made answer in the gentlest tones.

At 6 he ate dinner. From 7 to 9 he talked with Mrs. Bowser on various subjects, always placing her opinions in advance of his own, and at 9 he locked up the house, turned off the gas and went to bed. Mrs. Bowser tremblingly followed, wondering what calamity impended, and four or five times during the night she awoke and listened to hear if he was breathing all right. She was dreaming that he was dead when his old time voice aroused her. It was morning, and he was dressing and saying:

"Who in the old Harry kicked my collar under the bed? If this isn't the blamedest run house in four states then I don't know enough to come in when it rains!"

And she clasped her hands and thanked heaven that he was himself once more. M. QUAD.

Are the Colored Races Doomed?

By MAX NORDAU.....

LOOKING forward into the future, one often thinks of how future generations will solve the question of FOOD SUPPLY when the old countries of the world have become so crowded that they can no longer feed themselves.

Here one of the laws of nature will come into operation. The excess of the European population will flow out of the continent in the direction of LEAST RESISTANCE. This least resistance is offered by the colored races, and these, therefore, are of necessity doomed first of all to be dislodged by the sons of the white race and then to be ANNIHILATED.

The feeling of mutual responsibility which is gradually being embraced by all Europeans will not extend to the colored races. That uniformity of civilization which makes the peoples of Europe like to one another will not subsist between these and the inhabitants of the remaining continents.

The application of force, which in Europe will be prospectless, will guarantee an easy success BEYOND ITS BOUNDS. The European emigrant will not remove out of the temperate zone, which is the most beneficial and agreeable to him, farther than may be absolutely necessary. He will first of all settle the whole of North America and Australia and the whole of Africa and America south of the Torrid zone. Then he will take possession of the southern coasts of the Mediterranean sea and penetrate into the more hospitable portions of Asia.

The natives will first of all try to organize resistance, but will soon see that their only salvation is in flight. They will retreat before the Europeans and in their turn overwhelm THE SMALLER AND FEEBLER LANDHOLDERS, treating them in the same way as they themselves have been treated by the stronger whites.

Every generation, however, will produce in Europe a FRESH, superfluous swarm of human beings who will HAVE to emigrate. The new torrent will mount up beyond the highest water mark of the earlier stream, and the summits of European colonization will press farther and farther into foreign continents, always more and more approximating the equator.

THE INFERIOR RACES WILL SOON COMPLETELY PERISH. FAIL TO SEE ANY HOPE OF DELIVERANCE FOR THEM.

A Poem for Today

MANDALAY

By Rudyard Kipling

A FRENCH critic has declared that Kipling has the Anglo-Saxon temperament modified by the influences of the orient. "Mandalay" well expresses the fascination of the far east, although strict moralists condemn the laxity evident throughout the poem, especially in the last stanza. The dawn is said really to "come up like thunder" in Burma.

BY the old Moulmein Pagoda, lookin' eastward to the sea,
There's a Burma girl a-settin', an' I know she thinks o' me;
For the wind is in the palm-trees, an' the temple bells they say,
"Come you back, you British soldier, come you back to Mandalay!"
Come you back to Mandalay,
Where the old Flotilla lay;
Can't you 'ear their paddles chunkin' from Rangoon to Mandalay?
Oh, the road to Mandalay,
Where the flyin'-fishes play,
An' the dawn comes up like thunder outer China 'crost the bay!

'Er petticut was yaller an' 'er little cap was green,
An' 'er name was Supi-yaw-lat—jes' the same as Theebaw's Queen,
An' I seed her fust a-smokin' of a whackin' white cheroot,
An' a-wastin' Christian kisses on an 'eathen idol's foot:
Bloomin' idol made o' mud—
Wot they called the Great Gawd Budd—
Plucky lot she cared for idols when I kissed 'er where she stud!
On the road to Mandalay—

When the mist was on the rice-fields an' the sun was droppin' slow,
She'd git 'er little banjo an' she'd sing "kulla-lo-lo!"
With her arm upon my shoulder an' her cheek agin my cheek
We useter watch the steamers an' the hathis pilin' teak.
Elephints a-pilin' teak
In the sludgy, squddy creek,
Where the silence 'ung that 'eavy you was 'arf afraid to speak!
On the road to Mandalay—

But that's all shove be'ind me—long ago an' fur away,
An' there ain't no 'buses runnin' from the Benk to Mandalay;
An' I'm learnin' 'ere in London what the ten-year soldger tells:
"If you've 'eard the East a-callin', why, you won't 'eed nothin' else."
No! you won't 'eed nothin' else
But them spicy garlic smells
An' the sunshine an' the palm-trees an' the tinkly temple bells!
On the road to Mandalay—

I am sick o' wastin' leather on these gutty pavin'-stones,
An' the blasted Henglish drizzle wakes the fever in my bones;
Tho' I walks with fifty 'ousemaids outer Chelsea to the Strand,
An' they talks a lot o' lovin', but wot do they understand?
Beefy face an' grubby 'and—
Law! wot do they understand?
I've a neater, sweeter maiden in a cleaner, greener land!
On the road to Mandalay—

Ship me somewhere's east of Suez where the best is like the worst,
Where there ain't no Ten Commandments, an' a man can raise a thirst;
For the temple bells are callin', an' it's there that I would be—
By the old Moulmein Pagoda, lookin' lazy at the sea—
On the road to Mandalay,
Where the old Flotilla lay,
With our sick beneath the awnings when we went to Mandalay!
Oh, the road to Mandalay,
Where the flyin'-fishes play,
An' the dawn comes up like thunder outer China 'crost the bay!

Manasseh's Sin and Repentance.

If the son had reigned like the father, Jewish history would have to be rewritten. Hezekiah blended piety and patriotism. He threw the exemplary power incident to high position entirely on the side of a pure faith. He did more; he broke down, swept away the symbols and shrimes of a base and corrupt religion. He did not waver from this high stand during a reign which extended over nearly a third of a century.

Instead of perpetuating this admirable policy, Manasseh reversed it. He went through the whole catalogue of pagan vices. He was not content to go through it alone; he led his people and forced those who were unwilling. From augury and socery he went on to human sacrifice. He did not hesitate to throw his own children into the fiery embrace of Molock. The chronicler says he caused the people to do worse than the heathen. These perverts rivaled and surpassed those who had been born and reared in their dark faith. Theirs was the greater condemnation, for they sinned against light; and when God spoke to them in terms of warning and entreaty they would not hear Him but were defiant.

The depths of this apostasy can scarcely be fathomed. Cults never practiced on Jewish soil were now introduced. Putrid streams of lasciviousness flowed everywhere. The climax was reached when what was perhaps a phalic emblem was set up within the very courts of the temple of the God who had said to His people, Be ye holy, for I am holy. The bitterness of it was that the worst king of Judah reigned the longest. He had more than half a century in which to unmake his nation. A complete recovery was never made from this dreadful lapse.

Persecution naturally attended this apostasy. Tongues were raised in protest. There were knees that would not bend. Even royal patronage of idolatry was without weight with some pious souls. Manasseh made a short shift of such. He hurled the recalcitrant nobles from the cliffs, filled Jerusalem with innocent blood, and introduced a Jewish reign of terror.

But it is a long lane that has no turning. Manasseh was warned before he was struck; but he was insolent and defiant. He sinned against light and grace; and he was obstinate and inveterate in his sin. The turn was sharp when it came. The haughty king was brought to the dust. Under the barbaric customs of the day, with a heavy double chain, hand and foot, and a ring through his nose, he was led captive to Babylon.

The glory of divine justice is, that its penalties are not inflicted as matter of vengance, but are intended to be reformatory as well as exemplary. The moment the exiled and suffering king came to himself, the God of his fathers heard his supplication and restored him to his country and to his throne.

The Teacher's Lantern.

Heathenism smoldered during Hezekiah's reign. Only a spark of it remained at his death. Manasseh might have quenched it forever. Instead, he fanned and fed it.

* * * * *

For nations as well as individuals ascent is always difficult. Descent is easy. Moral heights are reached by the pains of self-denial. They are held by continuous watchfulness.

* * * * *

There is a moral gravitation which accelerates the descent of man or nation which turns to the nether way. Power of resistance diminishes. Entangling compromises seem imperative. Velocity toward hell increases in incalculable proportion.

* * * * *

These conditions call for a moral earnestness on the part of both nations and individuals which will not tamper with or allow the beginning of evil.

* * * * *

The prophets Jeremiah, Zephaniah, and Micah paint the nocturn of these evil times.

* * * * *

During his exile Manasseh had opportunity to study paganism on its native health. He saw the fruits of its ascendency during long ages. He could compare and contrast them with the fruits of the pure theistic faith of the Hebrews. Perhaps this was one purpose of his exile.

* * * * *

The exemplary power of the divine clemency in the case of Manasseh can hardly be estimated. In a brutal and unforgiving age, when the conqueror delighted in torturing his prisoners to death inch by inch, the Lord set His prisoner free the moment he was genuinely penitent. His punishment was reformatory, not vindictive.

* * * * *

But Manasseh's past could not be effaced. He could no more stop the course of the evil example of half a century, than he could call back the sons he had devoted to Moloch. Sin is a fire that leaves its scar.

* * * * *

It seems curious that Hezekiah should have give his son the name of one of the tribes in the northern kingdom. If it was in honor of the zeal in which that tribe had joined in Hezekiah's reforms then the son strangely perverted the father's meaning, and deeply sullied a good name. If the name was given in hopes that the wearer of it should reign over the reunited kingdoms, the father's hope was sadly disappointed. The son ignominiously lost a kingdom, instead of acquiring another.

* * * * *

History affords many parallelles to the lapse under Manasseh. Witness the English Restoration after the Commonwealth, and the Florentine reaction after Savonarola.

REBUKE DEMOCRATIC BOSSES BY ELECTING A REPUBLICAN LEGISLATURE.

The Poe Amendment ought to be beaten and if the signs of the times are interpreted correctly the people, regardless of party, are determined it shall be. There has been some sort of disposition on the part of some of those Democrats who are opposed to the Poe Amendment, to vote for Democratic candidates for the Legislature. This is a great mistake. The candidates named by the Democratic management will, with few exceptions, be controlled by them and if this is true, why should the "Ring" have the aid of men who do not believe in them nor trust them? It is not enough to kill the Poe Amendment. The men responsible for such a vicious measure ought not to be given further power to work injury to the State. Then, we recognize that the present election law is dishonest and ought to be repealed or amended in many important particulars. In the campaign two years ago relief was promised by both Governor Warfield and Attorney General Bryan, but these gentlemen while bearing the heat and burden of the campaign were totally ignored by the "Ring" and what they promised in the way of remedial legislation has not been made good by the "powers" that control the Democratic party. The Democratic managers did not dare to submit a Constitutional Amendment to the people until they had so doctored the election law that thousands of citizens, white and black, could not sufficiently master its technicalities to register their vote upon it. To vote for a Democratic Legislature in the present circumstances, while voting down the Poe Amendment, is like handing a fresh gun to a man who had sought your life and whom you had succeeded, after a bitter struggle, in disarming.

DANGEROUS POSSIBILITIES

A feature of the disfranchising amendment, concerning which but little has been said, is the provisions that, after 1906, the grandfather clause is to be inoperative. This means that all white men coming of age in this State after that date will be required to demonstrate their knowledge of the constitution as the negroes will have to do; that is, they will be compelled to satisfy the registrar, or registrars, that they understand and can interpret the meaning of any section of the constitution which they may be called upon to read, or which may be read to them. Cursory examination of this provision leaves nothing but surprise that negroes are to be placed on political equality with the whites after the negroes shall have been disfranchised if the amendment shall be adopted. A close inspection or analysis, however, would seem to suggest a reason for treating white men differently after 1906 from the course laid out to be pursued toward them during that year. Without doubt the Democratic managers are convinced that, if they can succeed in securing the adoption of the amendment, they will beginning with 1906, have the political affairs of the State in their own hands for an unlimited time. Then they will either be independent of the young white men approaching their majority and can afford to accord to them the same sort of treatment meted out to the negroes, or they can, by amending the election law, provide for a single officer of registration and select such men for that position as will make it easy for white Democrats as to register and difficult for Republicans to do so, whether white or black. In either case it is apparent that the amendment is designed to give the Democratic party managers an unfair advantage in the politics of the State, and honest Democrats should give this whole subject careful analysis before irrevocably deciding to vote for an amendment to the constitution that is so full of dangerous possibility.

BITTINGER.

It is said of a clergyman, who was more noted for his love of athletic sports than for earnest piety, that he went out with the boys, one Sabbath afternoon, to play a game of baseball down in Deacon Skinners pasture field. The game waxed exceeding hot and the boys gave vent to frequent outbursts of profanity, which displeased the minister, and he very earnestly reproved then, whereupon the Deacon wishing to be on the ministers side, exclaimed; "That's right Parson, if them boys don't quit their d——d cussin' I'll chase every d——d one of 'em out of my field." The moral is evident.

The happiest chap in this world is the common everyday chap who makes his own living, pays his own bills, has a little money as he goes along, but does not strive to get a corner on the local output and is a slave neither to ambition nor society. He loves his God and his fellowmen, the haven of rest, never has to sit up nights to poultice his conscience, believes in the doctrine of live and let live. The plain man is happy because he is satisfied and does not spend his life yearning for things four times too large for him.

MR. BOND'S PLATFORM.

Candidate for State Senate Enunciates His Principles In a Letter.

Mr. Ninian U. Bond, of Bond, who has been quietly at work among his friends for several months working up his candidacy for the State Senate is out in a letter placing before the people of the county his platform.

Mr. Bond in his letter comes out squarely against the Poe Amendment and favors the election of the School Commissioners and Road Supervisors, and promises to use his efforts toward improving the schools in all parts of the county. He does not indulge in any billingsgate or mud-slinging against his opponents in the race but simply sets forth in brief the matters which he thinks needs attention at the hands of the State legislators.

The letter is as follows, being dated at Bond, July 25th:

My Dear Sir:—I take this method to announce to you that I am a candidate for the State Senate, subject to the decision of the Republican Nominating Convention of Garrett county.

I have been a Republican worker all my life, and a citizen and heavy tax payer of Garrett county for several years and intend to make this county my permanent home. My business interests throughout the county are such that I feel that I understand the needs of the county as much as any other resident in it, and because of the much-needed legislation for the benefit of the county I am prompted to become a candidate and to thus appeal to the whole people for their support and not to any clique or faction.

1st. I am opposed to the Poe Amendment or any other legislation that has for its object the disfranchisement of any of our citizens.

2nd. I am opposed to the trick ballot system and will promise you, if elected, that every effort will be made to have the party designation again placed upon the ballot so that the voter will not be confronted with a Chinese puzzle when he goes to the polls.

3rd. I will use all my efforts to have a law passed whereby the School Commissioners will be elected by the people and not appointed by the Governor, and a State appropriation made for the benefit of our schools so that the boy and girl on the farm shall have just as good teachers, as comfortable school houses and as many months' school as the boy and girl in the town or city, and at the same time the taxes not to be increased, but diminished, on the already over-taxed farmer and property owner.

4th. I shall endeavor to have a law enacted so that our Road Supervisors shall be elected for each district by the voters of that district, and not appointed by the County Commissioners as they now are, and that each District shall have its just and equal share of the road tax to be used for the improvement of its own roads.

5th. I shall endeavor to have a law passed to foster the sheep industry and for the better protection of the farmer who is interested in this profitable branch of stock raising so natural to our mountainous county.

I trust that I shall be able to see you between this and the day of the primaries, which are to be held on August 5th, so we can talk over the above and the many other needs of our county in person.

I beg to remain, sir,
Yours very respectfully,
N. U. BOND.

THE HAYFEVER.

Many Great Men Have Suffered From It.

The season for the hay fever is almost here. It does not strike the suffers all the same day, but has a certain day for each victim. The writer has been a sufferer for over 30 years. His day is a little later than most of others—the 20th of August sharp. It stays till frost and cool fall weather comes, and then disappears almost suddenly. But for the past seven years the writer has been an exception to its departure feature. It now remains the year round in the form of a chronic catarrh.

This season, from present appearance will be a bad one on the victims for the reason that there is such a rank growth of vegetation and weeds. They are really the source of the pest. Rag weed bears the most blame, but there are others about as sinful, for instance vermifuge, gymson, rag weed and the like. Really a vegetable garden in its perfection is a bad place for a patient. There is hardly any vegetable in a garden that is not hurtful, cabbage excepted, which has no oder.

There are many farm products that are harmful to a subject. But the leaves of the forest trees are not. A grove of maple sugar trees in the cool mountain regions with their sweet scented foliage would be a preventative. There is no place where there is such relief as on the mountain peaks, where rocks and cliffs abound with farm products in the distance.

The wonder to many is how the name hay fever came for the ailment. Certainly hay as such does not cause or aggravate it. Indeed ripe agricultural products does not only rank growing vegetation.

Two of the great men of this country were sufferers from the malady, Daniel Webster one. Scores of intelligent letters of his are the subject appears in his volumns of private correspondence. No physician appears to understand it, as he did. He died October 26, 1852, while it was still lingering upon him. It was not the immediate cause. It was said H. Ward Beecher was also a sufferer but he appears to have left no writings on the subject. In my opinion catarrh is the most appropriate name for the fearful annual visitor.

The Kind You Have Always Bought

An Eloquent Address to the Fathers and Mothers.

By "J. B. F." in the Lonaconing Star.

The old maxim, "Familiarity breeds contempt," may with facility be changed into "Familiarity breeds forgetfulness," and both the truth and universality of the latter version will be equally as great and extensive as those of the former. So in the daily life of every individual, of every family, in any community, the prosecution of the ordinary diurnal duties, the various avocations of the different members of the household, the meeting day after day with the same persons, including time after time in the same topics of conversation, permitting even the slightest privileges to gentlemen visitors, these and the thousand and one other tasks and pastimes that make up the sum of daily life, are but too apt to cast a cloud over the mind, a veil over the the eyes, especially of trusting and unsuspecting parents, so as to render them incapable of understanding and unable to see that canker of immorality, which, born in the depraved tendencies of the human heart and nurtured by the satiation of our base appetites, is ever at hand, coiled and prepared to get in its fell and fatal work. Insinuating its loathsome form into some happy household, this intangible thing we are attempting to depict, and which has been aptly represented as a worm, secret and subtle, has there, alas! in too many cases, blasted many a lovely bud that gave promise of blossoming out into a fullblown rose, the pride and delight of the home, and made of that once happy dwelling, the abode of contentment and peace, a place of sorrow, of shame and of tears!

Now it is an established fact, an indisputable fact, that a person of intelligence, of ordinary powers of observation, on coming into a strange place, will see more, in a short time, and know more that's going on than some of the oldest inhabitants. For the place being new to him, and everything novel and interesting, he will notice more, and his perceptive faculties will not be dulled or lulled by familiarity with his surroundings. Such is precisely the case with the writer of this letter. Having traveled about Uncle Sam's extensive dominions from one end to the other, and as Homer sings of his hero, Ulysses, "having seen the cities and observed the customs of many men," he finally blew into the town of Lonaconing. And what did this philosophic spectator behold therein that inspired the penning of these lines?

Sitting one evening—it was pay day at the mines—he saw crowds of gaily and becomingly dressed young people promenading along the main thoroughfare of the town. Some of the youthful demoiselles were exceedingly pretty, with well proportioned and symmetrical figures, rosy cheeks and sparkling eye, all attesting to the healthful and invigorating nature of the mountain climate in which they lived; others of the throng, though not, perhaps, cast in so fair a mould, were nevertheless attractive in their appearance, and all were arrayed in a tasteful style and manner, such as would become the female portion of any city in the land. While admiring this crowd of young people, the inditer of these lines, who well illustrates the truth of Aristotle's remark, that "Dens hommini dedit ingenium curiosum," ("God gave to man a curious disposition"), made inquiries of those nearby as to the manner of life, the morals, customs, etc., of the people of this region. To his extreme surprise and grief he learned, and personal observation subsequently corroborated the information, that among those very pretty and innocent-looking girls he was just admiring, immorality was rampant, the virtue of modesty, reserve and chastity were rapidly falling into comtempt, and further, that some, yeilding to the seductive influences which surround them, to their own independence of spirit, and to the depraved passions and appetites to which all flesh is heir, had fallen from that straight and narrow path which leads to eternal bliss.

Now, it might be said by those who, perchance, may peruse these lines, that such a statement as to vice and immorality flourishing in the towns of this region might with equal propriety and truth be made of people everywhere, there being black sheep in every flock. But, I answer, this lack of virtue and disregard for integrity of life is greater here; what is more dangerous, it is confined mostly to the younger sect, and worst of all it is not on the wane, but is increasing with the lapse of time. Therefore, since this poisonous shrub seems to be more widely diffused here than elsewhere, and more virulent and deadly in its effects upon the morals and manners of the community, all the more necessity is here for drastic and adequate measures to eradicate from the soil this rank and execrable weed, and in its place to plant the violet of truth the lily of purity and the rose of holy aspirations.

There is no sin, there is no vice, there is no corrupting defect which can afflict a human being that is more odious to God and man, that comes more under the ban and reprobation of law divine and human, than unchastity in woman, and incontinence in man. Two ancient and venerable cities, Sodom and Gomorrha, as the holy Scriptures relate, were destroyed by a rain of fire from heaven, because of the prevalence of these identical sins therein which had aroused the consuming wrath of the Almighty.

From the beginning to the end of the inspired writings, that well-spring and source whence Christian men and women draw daily inspiration for their conduct in life and upon which all enlightened creeds are buttressed as upon a foundation impregnable, there is no precept that is oftener reiterated that is asserted with more emphatic force and vehemence, than that which inoculates purity of life, and depression of our baser instinct.

This precept, or rather commandment, is, as it were, a golden thread, or a necklace of jewels, which starting at the very alpha of the sacred writings, runs through from verse to verse, from chapter to chapter, from book to book, in the old, and especially in the new testament; and repeated again and again in different words and phrase, shine with a brighter luster, with a more undying brilliancy, where the various writers of the word of God grow more eloquent, more enraptueed, more inspired.

It was his supreme regard for this purity of heart that led Christ himself when dying on the cross to entrust his mother, the blessed Mary, to the beloved disciple St. John, committing her to his custody in words which have echoed with a sweet cadence down through the centuries that has passed: "Son, behold they mother, mother behold thy son!" Because he know that in the breast of St. John there was no quile, and that from his boyhood, his life had been pure, even as a virgin's.

The rise, progress and fall of kingdoms, nations and empires which so strikes the imagination and moves the interest of the student of history, can all be explained thus: as long as a nation is filled with patriotism, and practices in its daily life the simple virtues of honesty, truth and moral dealings with others, as long as there exists among the people of high moral standard, and the ties of marriage looked upon as inviolable and pure, so long will that nation rise, flourish and attain earthly grandeur. But where these virtues have no place, or have been banished from the people's daily life, and are fallen into desuetude and neglect, there no State can prosper, but enervated by luxury and its attendant train of vices, reviling religion and its stern decrees, despising those things that exalt, loving those that degrade, the nuptial vows are made a mockery, the legitimate wedlock is contemned, and a free rein being given to every loose and lustful desire, the way is paved for the country's overthrow, her ruin, and her final fall. This is the plain lesson taught by the record of the past, which, if any disbelieve, let him seek the pages of history, and from that treasury of learning, convinced himself that what I say here is the truth.

Such is the result to the state of immorality among the people. But how infinitely greater are the evil effects of this impurity of life upon the family, one of the units which go to make up the State, and upon the integrity of which the welfare of the commonwealth depends!

The unspeakable shame, the disgrace and ignominy which ever attend upon and rankle in the breasts of the members of a family, some daughter of which has perhaps been debauched and deflowered through the moral turpitude of possibly an honored guest, are feelings not easily to be keenly felt by those who must experience them.

The woman who has fallen, how must she feel when she realizes the great irreparable loss which she has suffered? All that makes a woman beautiful, all that she has to live for, through the folly of a moment, gone, gone, never to be recalled. All the amiable qualities which are peculiarly hers, the softness and sweet attractive grace which once distinguished her, have made her the cynosure of neighboring eyes; are all now in Ophelia s expressive phrase, "Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh," and all that remains for her in this life, all that she has to look forward to, is a wretched existence through which she must sit "like Patience on a monument smiling at grief."

The injury, moreover, in the case I have just mentioned, is aggravated by the peculiar circumstance that the law of England, that bulwark and fountain of justice, however perfect and adequate in other respects, provides here no remedy; and the parents for the shame and degradation they must needs feel and experience can be recompense only by paltry damages based upon the loss of the daughter's services.

It might be recalled in this connection that there is a vast difference between reputation and character. The former is that more or less arguing of opinion which an indefinite number of people hold of some one, gathered and formed by the person's demeanor, his action and his words. The latter is what a person really is, what he knows himself to be, regardless of what others may consider him. People, however, are liable to form erroneous estimates of another's character, and hence it is we often find, when we come to know him, that a person of harmful reputation, is of upright character, and by no means what he is regarded by others.

Now by reason of her sex and the peculiar constitution of society—which is ever harsh toward women and lenient towards men—the least word, the least breath, the least ill report, noised about, against the good name of a woman, is liable to, and often does, blast and damn her forever, while her genuine character may be unimpeachable, unpolluted, unspotted, and pure as virgin snow.

From this characteristic of mankind to judge woman so strictly parents can see what care must needs be exercised over their daughter's fair name, and daughters, with what facility and dispatch, even without actual wrong on their part, their honorable reputation is lost.

In ending this passage, I can think of no more apt or appropriate quotation than that often used, but true and beautiful verse of England's immortal bard; "Good name in man or woman, dear my Lord, is the precious jewel of their soul. Who steals my purse, steals trash, t'is something, nothing, t'was mine, t'is his, and hath been slave to thousands; but he who filches from me my good name robs me of that which not enriches him but makes me poor indeed."

There is, in very truth, no department of human life which this promiscuous incontinence does not reach and vitiate, for wherever they go men carry with them the lewd tendencies of their baser nature. An old Latin treatise on eloquence says: "Neminem oratorem esse posse, nisi virum bonum," no one can be an orator except a good and upright man. To my humble mind the old saw should read: No one can be good in any vocation except a good and upright man.

Some of the sentiments contained in this letter have undoubtedly been entertained, and uttered by a priest, formerly residing in this locality, Father Sartori, who appears to have considered dancing as the copious source and spring from which flow the evils I have attempted to describe. But surely the reverend Father was not altogether correct in his hypothesis.

From the very dawn of history, from times so for back that we have no authentic accounts of them but rude carvings and hieroglyphics, dancing has been one of the chief amusements and recreations of the human race. It requires no wide stretch of the imagination to picture our primal parents, Adam and Eve, dancing upon the greensward, amid the beauties and delights of Eden. And we can fancy how the rude cave dweller or lacustrine, who lived in the barbarous age of the world, on returning from a successful hunt or battle with his enemies gave expression to his feelings of exaltation which inspired him, by uncouth gambols at the mouth of his gloomy dwelling. It has always been considered as an art, and among the ancient Greeks, who had such a keen and lively appreciation of all that is beautiful in life and nature, was regarded as an amiable and entertaining accomplishment. With them as with the Romans, and their descendants, the Italians of the present day, the art of rythmic motion was ranked with music, sculpture, painting, architecture and the other "artes humanae," or fine arts, in which the old classic nations attained such unparalleled elegance and perfection.

When the splendid civilizations of antiquity fell into decay, the muse of the many-twinkling feet passed on, and reigned in the many petty kingdoms that were established upon the ruins of mighty Rome.

Gliding over the majestic Rhine, Terpsichore delighted the fraus and frauleins of the German empire. Thence passing the lofty Alps she made untiring devotees of her shrine the dark-eycd daughters of Italy, of France and Spain; and finally reaching America, the land of equality and liberty, she has here continued to rule, gaining numerous followers and delighting the hearts of thousands, make them forget the time, in the enjoyment of her charms, the cares and vicissitudes of life.

With such a beneficent history, how can we look upon her as the source of the evils we have been depicting.

As it is natural for man to give expression to the roamings of his fancy in poetry, or to the deeper thoughts of his mind by pictures, writing, or other artificial means, so is it likewise natural for him to disclose the sentiments which inspire him by the harmonious and rhythmical movement of his limbs. Indeed, dancing is more natural than writing to express feeling or thought, for in dancing no instrument is used but those given by Nature itself, which is not the case in poetry, prose or even verbal discourse, in all of which some extrinsic means or instrument is necessary.

I must ask pardon of the readers who may see these lines for these meagre observation upon the history and nature of the terpsychorean art, but I deemed it advisable in spite of the reverend priest's stand in the matter, in order to show that, although evil may follow, and very often does, from the abuse of dancing, yet in its true and proper use by ladies and gentlemen, it is good in itself, innocent in its nature, and graeeful and educating in its influence.

Where, then, are we to look for the origin of the evils under discussion? If I may venture to answer this question, I would say that the present laxity of morals which even the most obtuse of us behold on every side, is caused by the peculiar conditions of modern society. The chains which have for centuries and centuries bound the female sex to a life of home-keeping and seclusion, whose links were wrought by custom and handed down by tradition, have at last been resolved through the influence of modern civilization. Everywhere women are taking their place on an equal footing with men in this struggle for existence. The ties of the home, of family, and kindred are being relaxed, and woman freed from these restraining influences and safeguards, is subject to more temptations and allurements which her nature, weaker and more dependent than the masculine, cannot always successfully resist.

Thus far have I put down these thoughts as they have occurred to me, not paying much regard to unity or elegance of style, but striving to treat this delicate subject in as refined a manner as possible.

In conclusion, let me say, that upon every father and mother in the land, whom God, the giver of all good, has blessed with children to gladden their home and comfort their declining years, rests the sacred duty to guard their tender years, to protect their innocence and purity, and in the words of a noble educator, "To set them in the path that leads upward to the castle of holy aspiration, which is set upon a mountain peak of education, and wherein resides the heaven-born King of refined intelligence." The Man Who Makes
APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

JAMES BROCK,

An Eloquent Address to the Fathers and Mothers.

By "J. B. F." in the Lonaconing Star.

The old maxim, "Familiarity breeds contempt," may with facility be changed into "Familiarity breeds forgetfulness," and both the truth and universality of the latter version will be equally as great and extensive as those of the former. So in the daily life of every individual, of every family, in any community, the prosecution of the ordinary diurnal duties, the various avocations of the different members of the household, the meeting day after day with the same persons, including time after time in the same topics of conversation, permitting even the slightest privileges to gentlemen visitors, these and the thousand and one other tasks and pastimes that make up the sum of daily life, are but too apt to cast a cloud over the mind, a veil over the the eyes, especially of trusting and unsuspecting parents, so as to render them incapable of understanding and unable to see that canker of immorality, which, born in the depraved tendencies of the human heart and nurtured by the satiation of our base appetites, is ever at hand, coiled and prepared to get in its fell and fatal work. Insinuating its loathsome form into some happy household, this intangible thing we are attempting to depict, and which has been aptly represented as a worm, secret and subtle, has there, alas! in too many cases, blasted many a lovely bud that gave promise of blossoming out into a fullblown rose, the pride and delight of the home, and made of that once happy dwelling, the abode of contentment and peace, a place of sorrow, of shame and of tears!

Now it is an established fact, an indisputable fact, that a person of intelligence, of ordinary powers of observation, on coming into a strange place, will see more, in a short time, and know more that's going on than some of the oldest inhabitants. For the place being new to him, and everything novel and interesting, he will notice more, and his perceptive faculties will not be dulled or lulled by familiarity with his surroundings. Such is precisely the case with the writer of this letter. Having traveled about Uncle Sam's extensive dominions from one end to the other, and as Homer sings of his hero, Ulysses, "having seen the cities and observed the customs of many men," he finally blew into the town of Lonaconing. And what did this philosophic spectator behold therein that inspired the penning of these lines?

Sitting one evening—it was pay day at the mines—he saw crowds of gaily and becomingly dressed young people promenading along the main thoroughfare of the town. Some of the youthful demoiselles were exceedingly pretty, with well proportioned and symmetrical figures, rosy cheeks and sparkling eye, all attesting to the healthful and invigorating nature of the mountain climate in which they lived; others of the throng, though not, perhaps, cast in so fair a mould, were nevertheless attractive in their appearance, and all were arrayed in a tasteful style and manner, such as would become the female portion of any city in the land. While admiring this crowd of young people, the inditer of these lines, who well illustrates the truth of Aristotle's remark, that "Dens honmini dedit ingenium curiosum," ("God gave to man a curious disposition"), made inquiries of those nearby as to the manner of life, the morals, customs, etc., of the people of this region. To his extreme surprise and grief he learned, and personal observation subsequently corroborated the information, that among those very pretty and innocent-looking girls he was just admiring, immorality was rampant, the virtue of modesty, reserve and chastity were rapidly falling into comtempt, and further, that some, yeilding to the seductive influences which surround them, to their own independence of spirit, and to the depraved passions and appetites to which all flesh is heir, had fallen from that straight and narrow path which leads to eternal bliss.

Now, it might be said by those who, perchance, may peruse these lines, that such a statement as to vice and immorality flourishing in the towns of this region might with equal propriety and truth be made of people everywhere, there being black sheep in every flock. But, I answer, this lack of virtue and disregard for integrity of life is greater here; what is more dangerous, it is confined mostly to the younger sect, and worst of all it is not on the wane, but is increasing with the lapse of time. Therefore, since this poisonous shrub seems to be more widely diffused here than elsewhere, and more virulent and deadly in its effects upon the morals and manners of the community, all the more necessity is here for drastic and adequate measures to eradicate from the soil this rank and execrable weed, and in its place to plant the violet of truth the lily of purity and the rose of holy aspirations.

There is no sin, there is no vice, there is no corrupting defect which can afflict a human being that is more odious to God and man, that comes more under the ban and reprobation of law divine and human, than unchastity in woman, and incontinence in man. Two ancient and venerable cities, Sodom and Gomorrha, as the holy Scriptures relate, were destroyed by a rain of fire from heaven, because of the prevalence of these identical sins therein which had aroused the consuming wrath of the Almighty.

From the beginning to the end of the inspired writings, that wellspring and source whence Christian men and women draw daily inspiration for their conduct in life and upon which all enlightened creeds are buttressed as upon a foundation impregnable, there is no precept that is oftener reiterated that is asserted with more emphatic force and vehemence, than that which inoculates purity of life, and depression of our baser instinct.

This precept, or rather commandment, is, as it were, a golden thread, or a necklace of jewels, which starting at the very alpha of the sacred writings, runs through from verse to verse, from chapter to chapter, from book to book, in the old, and especially in the new testament; and repeated again and again in different words and phrase, shine with a brighter luster, with a more undying brilliancy, where the various writers of the word of God grow more eloquent, more enraptueed, more inspired.

It was his supreme regard for this purity of heart that led Christ himself when dying on the cross to entrust his mother, the blessed Mary, to the beloved disciple St. John, committing her to his custody in words which have echoed with a sweet cadence down through the centuries that has passed: "Son, behold they mother, mother behold thy son!" Because he know that in the breast of St. John there was no quile, and that from his boyhood, his life had been pure, even as a virgin's.

The rise, progress and fall of kingdoms, nations and empires which so strikes the imagination and moves the interest of the student of history, can all be explained thus: as long as a nation is filled with patriotism, and practices in its daily life the simple virtues of honesty, truth and moral dealings with others, as long as there exists among the people of high moral standard, and the ties of marriage looked upon as inviolable and pure, so long will that nation rise, flourish and attain earthly grandeur. But where these virtues have no place, or have been banished from the people's daily life, and are fallen into desuetude and neglect, there no State can prosper, but enervated by luxury and its attendant train of vices, reviling religion and its stern decrees, despising those things that exalt, loving those that degrade, the nuptial vows are made a mockery, the legitimate wedlock is contemned, and a free rein being given to every loose and lustful desire, the way is paved for the country's overthrow, her ruin, and her final fall. This is the plain lesson taught by the record of the past, which, if any disbelieve, let him seek the pages of history, and from that treasury of learning, convinced himself that what I say here is the truth.

Such is the result to the state of immorality among the people. But how infinitely greater are the evil effects of this impurity of life upon the family, one of the units which go to make up the State, and upon the integrity of which the welfare of the commonwealth depends!

The unspeakable shame, the disgrace and ignominy which ever attend upon and rankle in the breasts of the members of a family, some daughter of which has perhaps been debauched and deflowered through the moral turpitude of possibly an honored guest, are feelings not easily to be keenly felt by those who must experience them.

The woman who has fallen, how must she feel when she realizes the great irreparable loss which she has suffered? All that makes a woman beautiful, all that she has to live for, through the folly of a moment, gone, gone, never to be recalled. All the amiable qualities which are peculiarly hers, the softness and sweet attractive grace which once distinguished her, have made her the cynosure of neighboring eyes; are all now in Ophelia s expressive phrase, "Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh," and all that remains for her in this life, all that she has to look forward to, is a wretched existence through which she must sit "like Patience on a monument smiling at grief."

The injury, moreover, in the case I have just mentioned, is aggravated by the peculiar circumstance that the law of England, that bulwark and fountain of justice, however perfect and adequate in other respects, provides here no remedy; and the parents for the shame and degradation they must needs feel and experience can be recompense only by paltry damages based upon the loss of the daughter's services.

It might be recalled in this connection that there is a vast difference between reputation and character. The former is that more or less arguing of opinion which an indefinite number of people hold of some one, gathered and formed by the person's demeanor, his action and his words. The latter is what a person really is, what he knows himself to be, regardless of what others may consider him. People, however, are liable to form erroneous estimates of another's character, and hence it is we often find, when we come to know him, that a person of harmful reputation, is of upright character, and by no means what he is regarded by others.

Now by reason of her sex and the peculiar constitution of society—which is ever harsh toward women and lenient towards men—the least word, the least breath, the least ill report, noised about, against the good name of a woman, is liable to, and often does, blast and damn her forever, while her genuine character may be unimpeachable, unpolluted, unspotted, and pure as virgin snow.

From this characteristic of mankind to judge woman so strictly parents can see what care must needs be exercised over their daughter's fair name, and daughters, with what facility and dispatch, even without actual wrong on their part, their honorable reputation is lost.

In ending this passage, I can think of no more apt or appropriate quotation than that often used, but true and beautiful verse of England's immortal bard; "Good name in man or woman, dear my Lord, is the precious jewel of their soul. Who steals my purse, steals trash, t'is something, nothing, t'was mine, t'is his, and hath been slave to thousands; but he who filches from me my good name robs me of that which not enriches him but makes me poor indeed."

There is, in very truth, no department of human life which this promiscuous incontinence does not reach and vitiate, for wherever they go men carry with them the lewd tendencies of their baser nature. An old Latin treatise on eloquence says: "Neminem oratorem esse posse, nisi virum bonum," no one can be an orator except a good and upright man. To my humble mind the old saw should read: No one can be good in any vocation except a good and upright man.

Some of the sentiments contained in this letter have undoubtedly been entertained, and uttered by a priest, formerly residing in this locality, Father Sartori, who appears to have considered dancing as the copious source and spring from which flow the evils I have attempted to describe. But surely the reverend Father was not altogether correct in his hypothesis.

From the very dawn of history, from times so for back that we have no authentic accounts of them but rude carvings and hieroglyphics, dancing has been one of the chief amusements and recreations of the human race. It requires no wide stretch of the imagination to picture our primal parents, Adam and Eve, dancing upon the greensward, amid the beauties and delights of Eden. And we can fancy how the rude cave dweller or lacustrine, who lived in the barbarous age of the world, on returning from a successful hunt or battle with his enemies gave expression to his feelings of exaltation which inspired him, by uncouth gambols at the mouth of his gloomy dwelling. It has always been considered as an art, and among the ancient Greeks, who had such a keen and lively appreciation of all that is beautiful in life and nature, was regarded as an amiable and entertaining accomplishment. With them as with the Romans, and their descendants, the Italians of the present day, the art of rythmic motion was ranked with music, sculpture, painting, architecture and the other "artes humanae," or fine arts, in which the old classic nations attained such unparalleled elegance and perfection.

When the splendid civilizations of antiquity fell into decay, the muse of the many-twinkling feet passed on, and reigned in the many petty kingdoms that were established upon the ruins of mighty Rome.

Gliding over the majestic Rhine, Terpsichore delighted the fraus and frauleins of the German empire. Thence passing the lofty Alps she made untiring devotees of her shrine the dark-eyed daughters of Italy, of France and Spain; and finally reaching America, the land of equality and liberty, she has here continued to rule, gaining numerous followers and delighting the hearts of thousands, make them forget the time, in the enjoyment of her charms, the cares and vicissitudes of life.

With such a beneficent history, how can we look upon her as the source of the evils we have been depicting.

As it is natural for man to give expression to the roamings of his fancy in poetry, or to the deeper thoughts of his mind by pictures, writing, or other artificial means, so is it likewise natural for him to disclose the sentiments which inspire him by the harmonious and rhythmical movement of his limbs. Indeed, dancing is more natural than writing to express feeling or thought, for in dancing no instrument is used but those given by Nature itself, which is not the case in poetry, prose or even verbal discourse, in all of which some extrinsic means or instrument is necessary.

I must ask pardon of the readers who may see these lines for these meagre observation upon the history and nature of the terpsychorean art, but I deemed it advisable in spite of the reverend priest's stand in the matter, in order to show that, although evil may follow, and very often does, from the abuse of dancing, yet in its true and proper use by ladies and gentlemen, it is good in itself, innocent in its nature, and graeeful and educating in its influence.

Where, then, are we to look for the origin of the evils under discussion? If I may venture to answer this question, I would say that the present laxity of morals which even the most obtuse of us behold on every side, is caused by the peculiar conditions of modern society. The chains which have for centuries and centuries bound the female sex to a life of housekeeping and seclusion, whose links were wrought by custom and handed down by tradition, have at last been resolved through the influence of modern civilization. Everywhere women are taking their place on an equal footing with men in this struggle for existence. The ties of the home, of family, and kindred are being relaxed, and woman freed from these restraining influences and safeguards, is subject to more temptations and allurements which her nature, weaker and more dependent than the masculine, cannot always successfully resist.

Thus far have I put down these thoughts as they have occurred to me, not paying much regard to unity or elegance of style, but striving to treat this delicate subject in as refined a manner as possible.

In conclusion, let me say, that upon every father and mother in the land, whom God, the giver of all good, has blessed with children to gladden their home and comfort their declining years, rests the sacred duty to guard their tender years, to protect their innocence and purity, and in the words of a noble educator, "To set them in the path that leads upward to the castle of holy aspiration, which is set upon a mountain peak of education, and wherein resides the heaven-born King of refined intelligence."

The Man Who Makes
A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

How Joel Came to Time

By C. B. LEWIS

Copyright, 1904, by Charles B. Lewis

JOEL HASTINGS, son of Farmer Hastings and twenty-five years old, had been courting Betty Johnson, daughter of Farmer Johnson and only a year younger, for almost three years—that is, he had taken her to the circus and spelling schools and husking bees, and he had called at the farmhouse Sunday and Wednesday evenings and sat on the edge of a chair and shuffled his feet around and spoken of the weather and the crops. There was no doubt that Joel was in love, but he was a bashful lover. He had been given several broad hints by Farmer Johnson and several broader ones by Betty's mother, and his own parents had asked him if he was waiting for the earth to revolve the other way, but the shy Joel continued to be shy. While he felt reasonably certain that Betty

"JOEL IS AWFULLY BASHFUL."

Johnson returned his affections and would probably blush and simper and lay her hand in his when he propounded the awful question, a chill crept over him at the bare thought of a refusal. On a hundred different evenings he had his mind firmly made up and the little speech at his tongue's end, but Betty giggled or the dog barked or the clock stopped and left him hanging in the air.

Such was the state of affairs when Uncle William arrived on the scene. Uncle William was Farmer Johnson's brother and a widower. Indeed, he was three widowers rolled into one, having married and buried three wives. Uncle William was a hustler in matrimonial affairs. He had never spent over three months in courting a girl, and he couldn't see why any one else should waste time.

"Look here, Sarah," he said to Mrs. Johnson when he had been told of Betty's long engagement, "it's a good thing I made up my mind to visit you. I'll either bring that young man to book or send him off to spark his own grandmother. If he wants to marry Betty let him go ahead and marry, but if he doesn't he can't come scraping the mud off his boots around here. I've got to talk to that gal."

He did. He asked her to take a walk with him down past the haystacks and into the orchard, and as he fired harvest apples at the guinea hens wandering about he opened the interview by saying to Betty:

"Now, then, how much longer is that feller of yours going to hang about with his tongue in his vest pocket? Why doesn't he toe the mark like other folks? It's simply ridiculous the way he dilly dallies along. He's wasted more time than I did in marrying three women, and he hasn't got to the point yet. Is he waiting for you to propose?"

"Joel is awfully bashful, you know," replied Betty in her lover's defense.

"Then he ought to have been a hen."

"I'm in no hurry to get married."

"Well, you ought to be. A gal of your age won't have many chances. You just ought to let that Joel understand this very night that if he comes here simply to twiddle his thumbs and guess it's going to be a good year for catnip he can take himself home again. Does he ever talk love?"

"I—guess so."

"Has he asked you to set the day?"

"N-not yet."

"Well, there you are! Courting you for three years and yet never talking love or asking you to set the day! Betsy, something has got to be done."

"But I'm not worried or anxious, Uncle William," protested the girl. "When Joel has made up his mind he will perhaps ask"—

"Something has got to be done," repeated her relative as he upset a guinea hen with an apple, "and your Uncle William is the man to do it. Yes, sir-e-e. That calf of a Joel has reached the end of his rope, and in less 'n a week you'll have him tied up in knots, or he'll be hiding in the huckleberry swamp!"

Betty protested, coaxed and sulked, but Uncle William was firm. He hadn't made up his mind yet whether he would take a fourth wife or not, but he had decided to take a hand in this affair at any rate, and as he threw his last apple at the last hen in sight he closed the interview by saying:

"I'm going to give Joel a surprise party, and you just tend right to your business, same as usual. I shan't break his heart or cripple him for life, but he's got to toe the mark or jump rail fences."

Farmer Johnson was a slow going man who never mixed up in politics, love or school district disputes, and he was left out of the conspiracy. His wife, Sarah, entered into the matter with a good deal of zeal, however, and three or four days later there was an arrival at the farmhouse. Uncle William had sent for three of his nephews, who were generally referred to in their own community as "those Peckham boys." The youngest was eighteen and the eldest twenty-four, and the object was to make Joel Hastings jealous. Betty had her suspicions and desired to be loyal, but the four men and a mother leagued against her were too strong. She rode out with Will, picked daisies with Tom and went fishing with Jim, and of course Joel heard of it. That they were her cousins made no difference. It might have done so but for Uncle William, who took care to throw himself in the young man's way and observe:

"Mighty nice gal, my niece, and one of them boys is sure to snap her up afore the summer is over. I've got a thousand dollars to give to the one who gets her. I heard you'd been spooning around, but of course she wouldn't look at you. She sets her cap a good deal higher. Her ma and pa and me are set on her marrying one of the Peckhams."

The green eyed monster came to Joel Hastings as planned for. It took away his appetite. It caused his plow to wabble among the cornstalks. It sat him out under the pear trees o' nights with his head in his hands and his back humped up. It did more. It kept him away from Betty. That was something Uncle William had not planned for, and he didn't know what to make of it, though he consoled himself by offering to bet his bottom dollar that "something would bust" within a fortnight.

"Don't you worry, gal; don't you worry," he said to Betty when a Sunday and a Wednesday evening had passed without bringing Joel. "That feller of yours is either getting ready to break for the woods or he's putting grease on his hair and lampblack on his boots and making up his mind to pop the question."

Ten days and nights had gone by, and no Joel, when there was a family gathering on the lawn after supper. Uncle William and Farmer Johnson sat on the grass, Mrs. Johnson rocked to and fro in her chair, while Betty reclined in a hammock and "those Peckham boys" leaned against the cherry trees and smoked cigarettes and talked golf. The robins were singing the sun to rest when a great clatter down the road drew the attention of all. First there came an old white horse on a lumbering gallop, and following him, because attached to it, was a rattle wheeled old buggy. Standing up in the buggy and putting on the whip at every jump was a hatless young man with his face a fiery red. Even had Farmer Johnson's family party failed to recognize the horse or the buggy they must have identified the young man as the long absent Joel.

There was no time for guessing and wondering. The cloud of dust and the old horse and Joel came on like a cyclone and stopped with a snort and a whoop at the gate. The next moment Joel was inside on the lawn. He had brought the green eyed monster with him even if he had left his straw hat half a mile back on the road. There was a do or die expression on his face that could not be mistaken for the serenity of the cornfield or the peace of the barnyard. Betty and her mother rose up to receive him, but he was too busy to be received, or had, rather, received himself. He seized "those Peckham boys," according to age and present condition, and flung them among the hollyhocks; he grabbed Farmer Johnson and rolled him over among the pinks; he lifted up Uncle William and heaved him into the top of a Siberian crab apple tree, and he picked up Mrs. Johnson and her rocking chair and dumped them into a bed of tiger lilies. There was no rest for him. He had come for Betty, and he meant to have her or die.

"ONE OF THEM BOYS IS SURE TO SNAP HER UP."

"Oh, Joel, what is it? What does it mean?" she cried as he jumped for her.

"By gum, you shall never marry anybody else while I live!" he hoarsely shouted as he picked her off her feet.

"But I don't want to!"

"You are mine if I die for it! Come along!"

No one interfered. From Uncle William down to the youngest Peckham, they were a dizzy lot, with bumps and bruises to fondle and soothe, and Betty was bundled into the buggy and the old horse put to the gallop again before a head showed above the grass.

"Now you see what you've done!" wailed Mrs. Johnson as she got up and faced her visiting brother-in-law.

"What have I done?" he asked as he loosened his necktie and gave his Adam's apple fair play.

"Joel has turned pirate and carried Betty off to sea."

"Don't you believe it. He's carrying her down to the Corners to marry her, and they'll be back by 9 o'clock. That's what we were planning for, wasn't it—to make him jealous? It came a leetle stronger 'n I looked for, but I'll bet my boots ag'in a rooster that there won't be any more twiddling of thumbs and sitting on the edge of chairs in this house. Your Uncle William has married and laid three different wives to rest, and don't you make no mistake on him."

HE SEIZED "THOSE PECKHAM BOYS."

Uncle William was a true prophet. Soon after 9 o'clock the old gray horse came trotting up to the gate with a bridal couple in the buggy, and as Joel entered the house with the blushing Betty on his arm he clinched his freckled hands and glared around and inquired:

"Has anybody here got any objections to this here performance?"

No one had. But it was Uncle William who stepped forward and felt of the bump on the back of his head and replied:

"No, there's no objections, Joel, but when you get after your second wife don't spark so long and don't stand so many of her relations on their heads. There's a heap of time wasted in sparking, Joel, and there's folks that object to being flung sky high into a crab apple tree."

Training Baby Memories.

As children, part of the Japanese education is learning to notice. A tray with a dozen things on it is given to the child for a few minutes, when it is taken away from him and he is required to repeat from memory the name of everything that was on the tray. Gradually the numbers of things are increased and the time he is allowed to look at them decreased, until noticing becomes a habit, and a single, cursory glance catches up main idea and details in an almost magical way. One mother, who heard of the method, was so struck by its simplicity and by the value of quick observing that she tried the experiment with her own children—not with trays and objects, but in their walks. She found that the children develop splendid memories as well.

Single Talents and Self Confidence.

A single talent man, supported by great self confidence, will achieve more than a ten talent man who does not believe in himself. The mind cannot act with vigor in the presence of doubt. A wavering mind makes a wavering execution. There must be certainty, confidence and assurance or there can be no efficiency. An uneducated man who believes in himself and who has faith that he can do the thing he undertakes often puts to shame the average college bred man, whose overculture and wider outlook have sometimes bred increased sensitiveness and a lessening of self confidence, whose decision has been weakened by constant weighing of conflicting theories and whose prejudices are always open to conviction.—O. S. Marden in Success Magazine.

He Was a Speaker.

Thomas B. Reed, when speaker of the house of representatives, once went into an unfamiliar barber shop in Washington to be shaved. When the negro barber had about finished he began to try to sell a hair tonic.

"Hair purty thin, suh," he said, fingering the two or three stray locks that fringed Mr. Reed's bald pate. "Been that way long, suh?"

"I was born that way," replied Reed. "Afterward I enjoyed a brief period of hirsute efflorescence, but it did not endure."

The barber gasped and said no more. Later some one told him he had shaved the speaker. "Speakah!" he exclaimed. "Don' I know dat? I should say he was a speakah, sure 'nuf!"

She Didn't Know It Was Jack Kissing Her

I HEAR no sound. Can it be that she is not here?

As I came into the hall I did not hear the rustle of a skirt. But the maid said she was downstairs. Why does she not come out to greet me?

I will enter the drawing room. Ah, the light is quite dim. Now I can see better, as my eyes grow accustomed to it.

What is that on the couch? It is she.

Sh! She sleeps. I will walk over and look at her.

How beautiful she is! Her cheeks are slightly flushed. Her hair! Heaven! I never knew she had such hair before.

She must have dropped down there and fallen asleep. Shall I awaken her?

I always knew that she was a pretty girl, but somehow I never realized how beautiful she was before.

My heart is going like a trip hammer. We are alone. I must kiss her. I cannot help myself.

Now I am leaning over—closer, closer. It is wrong of me? Well, I will answer for it if it is. There is no time now to argue. I love her, and I must have that kiss.

There! I did it. It was the finest kiss I ever took. I faint with bliss.

She still sleeps. Thank heaven! I can take another.

Here goes! On her lips this time.

How soundly she sleeps! That last one was a hummer! It should surely have waked her. Can anything be wrong?

Once more! And again! And again! What! Not awake yet?

"Darling, speak to me! It is I—Jack. Why did you sleep so soundly?"

"Oh, Jack, I was not asleep, and I didn't know it was—you."—Tom Masson in Lippincott's Magazine.

Discouraged.

"I'm downright discouraged," said the man who always looks on the dark side of life. "That's what I am—downright discouraged."

"What's the trouble?"

"Every summer that I can remember has produced a day that broke all previous records for heat."

"What of it?"

"Well, figure it out for yourself. Suppose it keeps up the pace for five or six years more?"—Washington Star.

An Insinuation.

Muggins—By the way, isn't one of your brothers a lawyer?

Bifkins—Yes.

Muggins—I suppose, like most lawyers, he would defend a mean, disreputable client, wouldn't he?

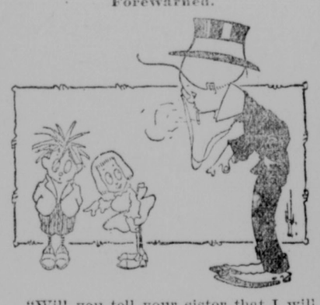
Bifkins—Possibly. You might go and state your case to him and tell him I sent you.—Detroit Tribune.

Couldn't Blame Him.

"Are you a lover of the national game?" asked the inquisitive passenger.

"Not me," answered the sad looking young man across the aisle. "I'm a baseball umpire."—Chicago News.

Forewarned.



"Will you tell your sister that I will call this evening?"

"Sure, but you'll be more apt to find her in if you come unexpectedly."—Browning's Magazine.

As Usual.

He—Yes, Dora trusts me. I am sure of it because she admitted her age to me.

She—Wasn't that clever of her?

He—How do you mean?

She—Why—er—clever to make you believe it.—Detroit Free Press.

Helpful Suggestion.

Excited Father—What are we going to do? These scales only register ten pounds, and the baby weighs more than that.

Calm Brother—You might chop off one leg and weigh that separately.—Somerville Journal.

How Nice of Him!

"Yes," said the fair young girl, "everybody says I'm just the picture of mamma."

"Well," replied the gallant youth, "you're certainly a very flattering picture."—Catholic Standard and Times.

Didn't Scare Him.

"De doctor tell me dat ter eat six watermillions at one time would sho' kill me."

"An' what you gwine do 'bout it?"

"I gwine ter die game!"—Atlanta Constitution.

Her Pensive Past.

Ere we were wed her pensive moods I
I oftentimes remarked—
The far look in her eyes, as though she trod the land of dreams—
But after we on matrimony's voyage had embarked
A change most sudden came o'er one or both of us, it seems.
She says 'twas I; I say 'twas she in whom time wrought the change
That makes her seem so very dear it oft provokes a row.
Yet, since her pensive moods have passed,
perhaps it isn't strange
That I should find so many moods of hers ex-pensive now.
—Roy Farrell Greene in Judge.

Boss Work.

A judge in a certain court has his own quick way of getting into the heart of a case. The following is told as a true story:

The lawyer for the plaintiff had just finished presenting his argument, and as he mopped his brow and sat down the judge stared at him admiringly with wide eyes and open mouth. Then he turned to the other lawyer, who had risen to his feet.

"Defendant needn't plead. Plaintiff wins," he shouted.

"But, your honor," protested the lawyer, "let me at least present my case."

The judge looked weary. "Well, go ahead," he grunted.

So the lawyer for the defendant went ahead. When he had finished the judge looked at him, too, with wide eyes and open mouth.

"Don't it beat the Dutch," he exclaimed. "Defendant wins."—New York Post.

Why They Did Not Work.

A university professor, wishing to study the tramp question during a summer tour through England, interviewed 2,000 wandering beggars, whom he questioned as to why they did not support themselves by work. Six hundred and fifty-three said they were willing to work, but could not obtain employment; 445 gave vague, unsatisfactory answers; 301 expressed the opinion that no one ought to be obliged to work, but if some fools did so they (the vagrants) considered they were justified in living on them; 407, according to their own statement, were proceeding to procure work at certain far-off localities, and the remaining 194, having expectations, were living in hope until their relations should die and leave them money.

Nutmeg Tree and Fruit.

"The nutmeg tree begins to bear at the age of ten years," said a gardener. "It keeps on bearing until it is ninety. The fruit resembles an apricot, and when the fruit is ripe it bursts open, showing at its heart the black nutmeg inclosed in a network of scarlet.

"The nutmeg, after plucking, must be dried. It is dried over a slow fire, and the process is tedious. It often occupies two months.

"Before shipping the nutmegs are always steeped in sea water and lime. This is to protect them from insects. They have nothing but insects to fear. In an insect proof condition they keep—well, they keep practically forever."—New Haven Register.

"VIMPS" RUGS ON DISPLAY

Floor Coverings Designed and Made In Garrett County Being Shown in Oakland.

In one of the Second street show windows of Messrs. D. E. Offutt & Sons' store may be seen a very pretty selection of floor coverings designed and made by some of the young ladies of Deer Park who are members of the Deer Park Village Improvement Society.

The "Vimps" rugs derived the name from the initials of the society and was coined by Mrs. Dr. John K. Mitchell, of Philadelphia, who has taken much interest in the society and its work.

The rugs are made of selected rags and are woven on a loom very much after the pattern of the machines used by the women of the eighteenth century in the manufacture of lindsey woolsey. The looms at Deer Park are operated by girls of the town who receive a stipulated amount per yard for their work, the residue after the rugs are sold being turned into the treasury of the society which organization has been of great and lasting benefit to the little municipality in making improvements to the streets, building and keeping in repair sidewalks and creating an interest in the appearance and sanitation of the town.

BITTINGER.

Verily the day of "tater bugs" and tender politicians is at hand, and as the pesky bugs sit about on the fence and beholdeth the vine when it is green and goeth in and maketh themselves fat on the substance thereof, so the host of them that camp round the gate of the city, that is called "The city of Political Blunder", behold the fatness thereof and smite the walls thereof and cry in a loud voice, saying: "Lo, I have served thee O, most noble party, from the days of my youth up; and at all times have I been thy willing scavenger bearing upon my own shoulders the filth of thy misdeeds, and now I pray thee make me to sit down in a clean and a soft place that my soul may be satisfied".

We learn with regret that Mr. Alph. Groves, of Jennings, a former resident of this place, is suffering the tortures and inconveniences of a severe attack of sciatica rheumatism.

The fact that a number of instances have been reported where stock which has been turned out at large, or in pastures insecurely fenced, have broken through and destroyed valuable growing crops for some of our citizens, brings to light the urgent need of some reform in the control of stock in this county. The latest disaster of this nature occurred within the past few days, when a number of cattle broke into a corn field belonging to Mr. Elias Lohr and about two and a half acres of splendid corn was destroyed.

Mr. Jacob Brenneman is confined to his home with a seriously sprained back, the result of a heavy lift.

Squire Wade H. Lohr, of Swanton, was seen driving on our streets last Monday.

Mr. Ham. Friend of Swanton spent last Saturday night with friends here.

The citizens of Swanton say they will put up a candidate for Sheriff, who the people will do well to elect, since if they should be sent up for lawlessness they would always find a friend there, and their stay made endurable, for they would live on "Ham"

Mr. Shoemaker, of Meyersdale, the maker of the celebrated "Carpenter Liniment", spent two days last week with his daughter, Mrs. Nelson Custer, at this place.

MARRIED.

ROCKHOLD — HAMILL — On Thursday, July 29th, at Listonburg, Pa., Mr. Hal Baldwin Rockhold, of Baltimore, and Miss Nancy Catharine Hamill, of Blaine, Md. The announcement of this wedding came as a great surprise to the relatives of the bride residing in this county where she was well and very favorably known as a public school teacher until a few years ago. During the past two or three years she taught in the Fairmont schools and at the time of her wedding was on a visit to relatives at Listonburg. She is a daughter of the late Rev. Archibald Hamill. The groom is a traveling man and is well known. The couple will reside in Baltimore where they will be at home after Nov. 15th.

HANNA HAS CALL FOR CHAIRMAN

Maryland Republican Leaders Seem to be United for His Reappointment.

Next in importance to the adoption of the party platform the members of the Republican executive committee, who voted on last Wednesday for an early convention, placed the election of a chairman of the State Central Committee. They declared that the campaign could not be considered under way until the new State Committee meets and a chairman is elected and takes office.

The State Convention will be held as provided by the resolution adopted at last Wednesday's meeting, on September 6, on which day the party platform will be adopted. Following the Convention the members of the State Committee will meet and organize and elect a new chairman. An adjourned meeting of the Convention will be held on September 26, when a candidate for Comptroller will be named, and all the actions of the earlier Convention indorsed.

In view of the fact that the State Convention is now only a little more than a month off, there is considerable discussion who will be elected chairman of the State Committee, but the sentiment seems to be rapidly crystalizating in favor of the re-election of Mr. John B. Hanna, of Harford county, who was first elected to the position in 1903, when his friend, Mr. Stevenson Archer Williams, was the Republican candidate for Governor. Mr. Hanna had charge of the campaign in 1904. He has been directing all the preliminary work of the party during the present year.

There is no other candidate for the position openly in the field. Mr. Phillips Lee Goldsborough has been mentioned, but under the rulings of President Roosevelt Mr. Goldsborough, who would probably have the support of the McComas-Pearre faction, would be forced to resign as Collector of Internal Revenue, and his friends declare that he has no intention of doing any such thing. Congressman Mudd has also been mentioned, but Mr. Mudd declares emphatically that he does not want the position, and seems to be sincerely in favor of Mr. Hanna. The city leaders, including Collector of Customs Stone and Congressman Wachter, also seem to be very much in favor of the reelection of Mr. Hanna.

Of considerable importance in connection with the question of the chairmanship of the State Committee is the position of Secretary Charles J. Bonaparte who has been keeping in close touch with the situation in Maryland and has had frequent interviews with the different leaders here. All reports seem to indicate that he has been taking a lively interest in the selection of a chairman, and that he has been endeavoring to conciliate the various factions so that there would be no possibility of a contest over the position. Maryland politicians who have seen him recently all seem to think that he also is very favorable to Mr. Hanna's re-election.

Concerning all the talk about the chairmanship Mr. Hanna keeps absolute silence. His friends, however say that he will not make a fight to hold on to the position if the recognized party leaders seem to be agreed that some other man can handle the coming campaign better than he can.

These same friends declare that there will be no agreement against Mr. Hanna, and that he will be re-elected without opposition.

In the city, Republicans are discussing the necessity for holding illegal primaries to select delegates to the early State Convention. There will be no trouble about such plans, it is believed. There is no opposition at present to the city organization, and there will be no fight over delegates to the Convention. The City Committee will probably meet next week and make plans for the holding of the primaries.—Baltimore News.

STORE CHANGES HANDS

Chas. B. Cropp Disposes of His Stock to Mr. James Treacy.

Mr. Charles B. Cropp, who has been a merchant for a number of years in Oakland, his store being located in the Ravenscroft building, disposed of his stock in bulk to Mr. James Treacy, of Hutton, on Monday, the new proprietor assuming charge Tuesday morning.

Mr. Treacy is a young man of good character and will no doubt make the business a success. Mr. Cropp will remove to Richwood, West Va., some time this fall where he has been engaged several months with a large lumbering plant.

TO THE REPUBLICAN VOTERS.

Mr. Brown Addresses Himself to Members of His Party.

This paper is in receipt of the following communication from Mr. Austin Brown, of Oakland, with the request that it be published:

To the Republican Voters of Garrett:

A report has been industriously circulated by some of my opponents that I have combined with certain other prospective candidates in order to gain strength for my candidacy. I wish to emphatically deny this and any other reports of like nature. I have not formed an alliance with anyone, nor do I intend to. I am making the fight for myself alone and if nominated will do all in my power to secure my election along with the rest of the ticket.

Very respectfully,
AUSTIN BROWN.

DEER PARK BAZAAR

To Be Held In the Deer Park Hotel Grounds August 12th.

It has been the custom for several years for the Deer Park Village Improvement Society, a society that has accomplished some good practical work, to hold a festival or bazaar in the Deer Park Hotel grounds. This year will be no exception, the committee having designated Saturday, the 12th of August, as the time for this year's fete.

Preparations have been going on for the event, and it will be better than ever. Some of the Deer Park Hotel guests are taking unusual interest, and will be present and lend substantial aid. Manager Burwell has been full of courtesy.

One of the industries of the members of the society is the making of rugs and these rugs, in the shape of a large display of unique designs, will be on exhibition and sale.

An opportunity will be afforded Oakland ladies to be present, see the large assortment and make purchases, thus patronizing a Garrett county enterprise.

The Deer Park Cornet band, attired in uniforms of a new design, will furnish music.

Miss Tullidge, Miss Turnbull, Mrs. Elmer Haulenbeek, Mrs. Truesdell, Miss Rose McGraw Mrs. G. W. Haulenbeek are the active members of the Bazaar committee.

RESURVEY COMPLETED

Remarking of the Mason and Dixon Line Finished.

The resurvey of the historic Mason and Dixon line has been completed by the surveyors jointly employed by the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland. When the Legislatures of these States decided not to allow the famous boundary line to lose its markings and drop out of existence, so far as visible signs of its location is concerned, they undertook a work that proved very difficult and tedious.

The surveyors were obliged to cut a path through the mountains and they found many of the old markers and crown stones displaced. In Adams county one stone was used as a doorsill in a dwelling, another in a church, some were doing duty in bake ovens and others were lying at considerable distances from their original places. All were recovered, although not without vigorous objection on the part of the people who were using them.

The work of re-establishing the line was very carefully done, and the old stone posts set along its course after Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon marked it out in 1763 were reset in solid cement bases, and iron posts were substituted in places where the old posts have disappeared.

It will be remembered that this line was the result of a dispute between the States of Maryland and Pennsylvania over their respective boundaries as described in their charters, and prior to the Civil War was popularly accepted as the dividing line between the free and the slave States. The boundary was marked by mile stones, every fifth one having the arms of Lord Baltimore engraved on one side and those of William Penn on the other.

Painfully Hurt In A Runaway Accident.

Mr. J. Frazier Shaw, of Pittsburg, who is identified with the management of the Loch Lynn Hotel at Mountain Lake Park, was painfully injured in a runaway accident on Saturday evening. Mr. Shaw, accompanied by a friend, had planned to drive to Oakland, but the horse took fright near the B. & O. track, ran over a freight platform and finally halted in a swamp with a portion of the harness and less of the vehicle. Both occupants of the vehicle were injured, though happily, not seriously.

MRS. SUSAN MATILDA OFFUTT.

Sketch of the Life of One Recently Deceased.

Susan Matilda Offutt, deceased on the 25 of July, 1905, at the home of her son, Daniel E. Offutt, in Oakland, Garrett county, Md., was born December 14, 1810, and was approaching the extreme age of 95 years. She was the oldest person in Oakland and very likely in the county. Her death came from time abradant or exhaustion. She was born in Oldtown, Allegany county, being a daughter of Daniel Lantz, a very prominent man in his day in old Allegany. She was married to Edmund Offutt March 3, 1829, who died about the year 1845. They had four children, Thornton, deceased; Daniel E., a prominent merchant in Oakland for many years; Mrs. S. M. Miller and Mrs. G. W. Legge, of the same place. Dr. John E. Legge, a grandson, is a practic-physician in the town.

Daniel Lantz was a prominent man in his day in the old county and died in 1816 leaving a widow, Margaret Lantz, and 10 children: three sons, Jacob, John and George, and seven daughters: Clarissa, wife of George Catlett; Julia Ann, wife of James D. Armstrong; Susan, wife of Edward Offutt; Sophia, wife of George W. Deveeman; Mary, wife of one Taylor; Elizabeth, wife of one Louthran, and Margaret, wife of John W. Mountz. None of the sons appear to have left children.

Jacob was the most prominent of the family. He was elected to our Legislature in 1824, 1831, '32 and '33—four times in all—a full legislation record; but it does not appaer when he died. Sophia, the wife of George W. Devecmon was the mother of Thomas Devecmon, Peter and William; and grandmother of J. Semmes, Wm. C. and George W. Devecmon six in all—all members of the Allegany bar expect the last, who is a young lawyer in the State of Washington. The last three are sons of the distinguished Thomas Devecmon, who died in 1864.

James D. Armstrong and Julia A., his wife, were the parents of five children: two sons and three daughters. The sons were William and Davisson. The former had a splendid mind of mathematical turn; died some years ago. Davisson is a very prominent business man in Frostburg, much esteemed. Here, too, intellect shows.

The deceased on account of her great age, had for some years led a quiet life, with or near her children. In her more early years, she had been quite active bodily, mentally and socially. She was a kind and discreet mother, an excellent neighbor and a generous friend. Was for seventy-five years a devout and active member of the M. E. church; always ready and willing for her share of its work until her age infirmities bid her to cease; to do so was one of her regrets. None can say in her death there has not been a deep loss and a source of sorrow to many appreciating persons.

The seven sisters each named a son Daniel in honor of their father. A strange coincidence in their lives and deaths. They all died in the order of time of their births. These facts come from one who knows.

Now a few words about the Lantz family or race. The male members especially were noted for their mental forces. A brainy race it has been called; active, aggressive, somewhat impulsive. It has been said of Jacob Lantz that his mind was of a high mathema tical character; that he could add up four columns of figures at the same time. Thomas Deveemon, a nephew, had the same natural gift, but said he could not tell how or why he could perform the wonder. But strange to say, the Lantz name has become extinct in the two counties, but the hereditary brains are yet visible, active and useful.

A number of the facts in this obituary, especially the names of the children of Daniel Lantz, were procured from the Court records, especially in an Equity case about sixty years ago in regard to the land estate of the Lantz ancestor.

Man Killed in Explosion.

At Howesville, W. Va., an exploding boiler killed Edward Greaser, aged 35 years and seriously injured three other men. Greaser's body was hurled 50 yards by the explosion, and when picked up it was found that the jugular vein had been severed as with a knife.

At Valley Point, W. Va., Wesley Miller, aged 18 years, was killed by being kicked in the stomach by a vicious horse.

STIRRING UP THE COUNTIES.

State Highway Engineer Crosby has found it necessary to call the attention of the authorities in some of the counties the fact that, though they have made application for State aid in building good roads, they have failed to carry out their original plans, and that if they do not comply with all the provisions of the law by August 5 the amounts originally allotted to them, under the provission of the Shoemaker road law, will be reallotted to other counties which are ready and anxious to increase the number of miles of good roads within their limits. It seems unfortunate that it should be necessary to stir up any county official on the subject of good roads, and there is a suspicion in some quarters that if the tax-payers of the counties knew of the lack of attention given the subject by the authorities there would be a different story to tell. Probably it is for this purpose that Mr. Crosby has published a report of the work that is being done in the various counties. From this report a tax-payer may in any county can determine whether the authorities are looking after his interests in the matter of building good roads, and if he finds that they are not he should most assuredly make it his busines to see that they realize the need for prompt action. Only five of the counties failed to apply this year for State aid, these being Garrett, Somerset, Wicomico, Calvert and Kent; but in several of the other counties, although application for aid was made, nothing further has been done. With the State paying half of the cost, good roads are now within reach of the every county in the State, and, in view of the widespread sentiment in favor of good roads, it would seem that carelessness on the part of the proper authorities is the only excuse that can be offered for failure this year to begin work in any county.

Twenty battles have been fought by the Russian and Japanese army and naval forces since the beginning of the war in the far east. It is estimated that the Russians have lost 507,526 in killed and wounded and the Japanese 156,155 in the 15 land battles fought. Every one of the 20 battles fought resulted in victory for Japan—a most remarkable and astonished record, and one that would have been almost unimaginable at the beginning of the war when Russia was believed to be one of the most powerful nations of the earth. In the last naval conflict it is computed that Russia's casualties were over 10,000. Russia lost 64 war vessels representing $150,000,000. Besides all this the expenditures necessary to keep the war in progress must have been a terrible drain upon the coffers of the two governments.

A RUNAWAY HORSE

Last Saturday Did Considerable Damage and Hurt Two People.

Last Saturday an electrical storm passed over this section of the county and did considerable damage, the most serious result of the storm being the injuries sustained by two persons who were hurt by reason of a runaway horse which took fright at the thunder and lightning.

The horse was owned by Mr. Henry Shaffer, son of Mr. Joseph Shaffer, residing on the Deer Park road, and was being driven from Oakland to the farm by its owner when it took fright at the loud and incessant thunder and broke away from its driver while ascending the Casteel hill, throwing Mr. Shaffer from the vehicle. The man struck on his shoulder dislocating it and breaking his collar bone. The horse went on toward its home and at the Shartzer placeencountered another horse being ridden by one of Andrew Shartzer's little boys. The Shartzer horse took fright also and threw its rider. The lad struck on his head and was considerably bruised about his face but escaped without any serious injuries.

The lightning struck on the wires of the Western Union telegraph company and entering the Oakland office burned one of the instruments out, setting fire to a file of train order blanks hanging against the wall but the flames were extinguished before any material damage resulted.

DAUGHTER OF A HERO OF 1776

Emorilla Glisan, Recently Deceased. Aged 85, Enjoyed Unusual Distinction.

Emorilla Glisan, a daughter of George King, a Maryland revolutionary soldier, died in Fayette county, Pa., on July 17, upon a ten days' illness and was interred in Uniontown, in the same county and state. She was born in what is now Garrett county, where she lived most of her long life. She went over into Pennsylvania some years ago. Her first husband was Joseph Ricknor; after his death she was married to Thomas Glisan, who died in 1884. She leaves a number of children, also a step son, Mr. Wm. R. Glisan. She was no doubt the last surviving daughter of a revolutionary soldier in all this region of country. She was a quite old lady, much respected, not only because she was a daughter of one of the revolutionary heroes, but for merit as well. She had a full sister, Ruth King, who never married and who died in 1903. The two were relicts of the war of independence. George King, the father, died in 1845 in Garrett county.

A FAMILY REUNION.

Happy Gathering of Judge Thomas Cuppett's Family Sunday.

A happy family reunion was held at the home of Judge and Mrs. Thomas Cuppett on Sunday last at which time all members of the family were present, including the father, mother, four daughters and five sons, their husbands and wives with the exception of Rev. J. H. Enlow, who was detained at home owing to his work. Twenty of the grandchildren were present also and a number of near relatives, making forty-one in all.

Upon the arrival at the homestead of the family the members indulged in social intercourse for an hour or two when dinner was announced of which all heartily partook. Following the dinner old and beautiful hymns were sung which brought back pleasant recollections of the days gone by. The grandchildren played and prattled in and around the house and their happiness revived the drooping spirits of the old folks.

We feel thankful that it has been possible for all to meet on the earthly side of the River and that another great reunion will be held on the heavenly side where partings, tears and farewells shall be no more.

We realize that God has been merciful to a family of sinful creatures when the father and mother have been spared to the reach the ripe ages of the sixties and the children from twenty to forty all of whom are enjoying good health.

We can only ask that God will be merciful and help us to be content with what He is pleased to give until he calls us home.

A MEMBER OF THE FAMILY.

Stranded in West Virginia.

The Texas Bill Wild West show which was scheduled to tour this locality, it would appear has fallen by the wayside, as it has not filled the dates it had made and people who had performed any service for the company are left holding worthless orders on the ticket wagon. The members of the show got into some trouble with a train of B. & O. excursionists two weeks ago in West Virginia and two of them were shot and killed. The show has since been held up by the minions of the law.

AN ECLIPSE OF THE SUN

Will be Visible to People of This Section This Month.

People rising at five o'clock on the morning of August 30, and trying to see the sun will find the moon in the way. The eclipse will be only partial here, and can be seen better with the aid of smoked or colored glass. Half of the sun will be observed when it rises, and the dark shadow will grow until only a bright crescent is seen, then the shadow will recede, and by six o'clock the disk will be clear again.

Before the sun rises on the Rocky mountains, or more accurately, before the earth turns around in its constant west to east rotation far enough for the people on the Rockies to see the sun, the moon will be passed out from between earth and sun and the eclipse will be over. Northern Spain and Canada hold lucky spots this time, where the eclipse will be total because the angles of vision will be just right there. Universities and astronomical societies all over the world will send expensive expeditions to these places and continuous photographs will be taken, for a total eclipse never lasts over six minutes, and this one lasts only three.

Scientists this year expect to learn something of the material of the sun from the rose colored flame and the brilliant corona which always surrounds an eclipse. Photographs of the last eclipse show eruptions from the sun of masses calculated to be larger than our earth, and fiery comets whirling about the central mass.

Accurately plotting the orbits upon which the spheres move and their schedule time of passing, scientists can now predict in 1925 a total eclipse will be visible in the United States, the first since the one of 1878, and in 1999 Paris will see one for the first time since 1724.

Superstition in regard to eclipses is not past. Even in this country a colored man thought the end of the world was at hand during the last eclipse and killed his wife and children to save them pain.

Long is the recording secretary of the society.

The primaries to be held on Saturday of this week in the several districts of the county, promise to be quite lively in one or two sections as determined efforts will be made by avowed candidates to carry the delegations favorable to their nomination through, especially is this the case in Districts Nos. 2, 7 and 14 where opposing tickets will be in the field. May the best man win!

Kimmell, of Grafton, had charge of the editorial department and he performed the duties devolving upon him to our entire satisfaction. He has returned to Grafton to resume his work with the Daily Sentinel of that city after a vacation of two weeks which was spent with friends in Oakland and vicinity.

Professor L. L. Friend, of Keyser, arrived in the city this morning to spend a few days visiting friends. He has resigned his position as principal of the University preparatory school at Keyser and will not be engaged in school work this year. He is not certain what he will do. The work was not suited to his physical condition and this was the cause of his resignation.—Morgantown Dominion.

Mr. A. W. Stanhagen, of Keyser, the engineer on the ill-fated passenger locomotive 2000 which blew up at Mountain Lake Park last January, was a visitor to Oakland Tuesday afternoon, being accompanied by several friends. ELECTION SUPERVISORS MOVE

Find New Quarters in the West Building On Alder Street.

Monday the Board of Election Supervisors moved its safe and other office fixtures from the opera house block on Green street to the small building owned by Mr. Truman West on Alder street, the change in location being made in compliance with the law which prohibits the holding of the polls in any building wherein intoxicating liquors are sold.

For several years past the Supervisors occupied a room in the opera house block which met with all requirements of the law. Recently a saloon was located in the building and as the election law expressly prohibits the holding of elections in the same building where there is a saloon or where intoxicating liquors are sold, the Board, to comply with its provisions, was compelled to seek other quarters.

Mr. M. H. Frankhouser, of near Craneaville, was in Oakland last Monday when he made this office a brief business visit.

Mr. John Ault, who has been working at his trade in and around Pittsburg for several months, is home for a visit of a week, having arrived Saturday evening.

Mr. White's friends in Oakland, and they are numerous, will be glad to welcome him.

Mr. Charles Guthrie, of Accident, who accompanied his wife to Baltimore last Thursday in which city she was placed in a hospital to receive treatment, returned to his home via Oakland Friday morning. Mrs. Guthrie for several weeks has been a constant sufferer but the physicians at the hospital hope to effect a permanent cure within a short time.

The Cumberland News sporting editor is suffering with imagination of the brain. Hark! "Listen, rooters, and hear of a pathetic tale of a chesty bunch of ball swatters from Pulpville, a little hamlet at the junction of the Potomac and George's creek. Once there resided in this forsaken burg a baseball team supposed to represent Piedmont, one of the many small specks on the West Virginia map. As is stated above, this aggregation became puffed up with pride after having defeated Cumberland twice in one day. Therefore, when the time came for the descent of the 'chesters' upon the Cumberland, they were possessed without doubt that victory was perched upon their banners. Score—Cumberland 8; Piedmont 1.

The editor spent last Wednesday and Thursday in Baltimore and Annapolis. In the latter city he submitted to the Board of Public Works of Maryland his bid for the State printing. Eight other employing printers from different sections of the State were present who submitted bids, the same ranging from $18,000 to $25,000. No award was made as Governor Warfield had discovered that during the rush of work at the close of the Legislature of 1904 the printing bill had been tampered with after its passage and prior to the time he attached his signature increasing the amount allowed for this item from $18,000 to $25,000. While the guilty party will be hard to locate the Governor is determined to make every effort possible to bring him to justice. The award will probably be made today but it will not come our way as the bid submitted by us amounted to $23,500.

One of the leading business men of Oakland has suggested to THE REPUBLICAN that the present would be a good time to advertise the town and its advantages as a place to locate labor employing industries and as a summer resort. Under existing conditions it is admitted that the summer resort business though better now than for a number of years past, cannot be depended upon forever and that to bring a substantial industry into the town or its immediate vicinity would do more to put money in circulation, give labor employment the year around and make everything more prosperous would be the proper thing to do. Oakland has many better natural advantages for the location of manufacturing industries than many towns which depend solely upon factories. We have the coal handy for power producing and while the matter is yet undetermined we may expect a pipe line for the conveying of natural gas from near Morgantown to Cumberland to be laid either through the town or in its immediate vicinity before another twelve months pass. The matter, as suggested above, will bear investigation.

United States Fish Commission Placed Thousands Here Last Saturday.

Last Saturday morning Dr. C. F. Brooke, of the United States Fish Commission, Washington, arrived here on train No. 3 with twenty large cans of brook and salmon trout which were distributed in several streams in the county.

The twenty cans contained on an average nine hundred fish each, aggregating 18,000 fish. They were somewhat larger than the fish usually shipped for stocking purposes and therefore they will be better able to care for themselves in the waters of their adoption.

NOT A HAPPY FAMILY.

Governor Warfield caused a commotion in Anne Arundel county last week by requesting the resignation of the Democratic members of the Board of Election Supervisors, one of whom, Dr. B. R. Davidson, complied, while the other, Mr. Frank S. Revell, refused to vacate the office. Thereupon he was dismissed by the Governor, who appointed Wm. Meade Holloway and Benjamin Watkins to take the places vacated. The newly appointed supervisors managed to secure control of the books of the board and Robert L. Werntz, the Republican member, co-operating, have selected and appointed a new list of election officers for the county. The action of the Governor was taken upon the ground that as Messrs. Davidson and Revell are aspirants for nomination by the Democratic party, they were personally interested in the matter of the appointment of election officers and were given an unfair advantage over other aspirants. Democratic primaries had been called for Saturday last, but in consequence of the Governor's action, they were called off by the Anne Arundel members of the Democratic State Central Committee. The faction with which Messrs. Revell and Davidson are connected declined to recognize this action and proceeded to hold the primaries under the original call. This action, however, has not been recognized by the Board of Election Supervisors, as newly constructed, and legal proceedings will be necessary to decide whether names of candidates nominated by the delegates elected on Saturday shall be printed on the official ballot for Anne Arundel county. The nominations were made on Wednesday.

Governor Warfield's determination to prevent the employment of the election supervisors' office to promote the interests of the candidates for nominations is worthy of all praise, but his action has made the Democrats of Anne Arundel county anything but a happy family.

THERE must be something radically at fault in a measure, claimed to be sanctioned by a political party, when thousands of the members of that party array themselves in open opposition to it. Take, for instance, the action of the Crescent Club of Baltimore in relation to the proposed disfranchising amendment. Here is a Democratic club, with a membership said to number 3,000, denouncing the amendment unsparingly and passing resolutions against its adoption without a dissenting voice. More significant still is the hostile attitude of the Democratic Governor of the State, the Democratic Attorney General, the Democratic State's Attorney of Baltimore and a long list of other prominent Democrats who regard the measure as utterly undemocratic and reprehensible. Apparently nothing but partisanship gone mad can tolerate a scheme which invests comparatively unlearned men, who know nothing about the proper interpretation of any provision of the constitution, with autocratic authority to exclude from registration whomsoever they may arbitrarily conclude is not sufficiently familiar with the organic law of the State.

Blessings of Poverty.

A young German who had drifted to Kansas with other harvest hands was taken sick suddenly near Abilene. He was taken to town and a couple of physicians pronounced it appendicitis. They would not operate unless paid for it, and the yonng man had no money, and no friends to guarantee payment. The county physician took charge of the case, pronounced it liver trouble and prescribed for it. The next day the man was well. Which shows sometimes a man is better off without money or friends.

JIM BLUDSO OF THE PRAIRIE BELLE

By John Hay, late Secretary of State, who died a few days ago.

Well, no, I can't tell you where he lives,
Because he don't live, you see,
Leastways, he's got out of the habit
Of livin' like you and me.
Whar have you been for the last three years
That you haven't heard folks tell
How Jimmy Bludso passed in his checks
The night of the Prairie Belle.
He weren't no saint—them engineers
Is all pretty much alike—
One wife in Natches Under-the-hill,
And another one here in Pike.
A keerless man in his talk was Jim,
And an awkward man in a row,
But he never flunked and he never lied,
I reckon he never knowed how.
And this was all the religion he had—
To treat his engine well.
Never helpast on the river,
To mind the pilot's bell;
And if ever the Prairie Bell took fire
A thousand times he swore,
He'd hold her nozzle agin the bank
Till the last soul got ashore.
All boats has their day on the Mississippi,
And her day came at last.
The Vovastar was a better boat,
But the Belle she wouldn't be passed
And so she came tearin' along that night,
The oldest craft on the line,
With a nigger squat on her safety valve
And her furnace crammed, rosin and pine.
The fire bust out as she cleared the bar
And burnt a hole in the night,
And quick as a flash she turned and made,
For that Willer bank on the right.
There was runnin' and cussin' but Jim yelled out
Over all the infernal roar,
"I'll hold her nozzle agin the bank
'Till the last galoot's ashore."
Through the hot black breath of the burning boat
Jim Bludso's voice was heard,
And they all had trust in his cussedness,
And know'd he would keep his word
And, sure's you're born, they all 'got off
Afore the smokestacks fell,
And Bludso's ghost went up alone
In the smoke of the Prairie Belle.
He weren't no saint, but at jedgment
I'd run my chance with Jim.
Longside of some pious gentlemen
That wouldn't shook hands with him,
He seen his duty, a dead sure thing,
And went for it there and then,
And Christ ain't a goin' to be too hard
On a man that died for men.

Visited Their Old Home.

Monday Mr. and Mrs. D. J. Beachy, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Beachy, Mrs. John T. Lee, Mrs. Jacob Briskey (widow) came to town to take the the train for their home which is Arthur, Ill. They had been visiting relatives and friends here the past four weeks, and were escorted here by Mr. M. D. Yoder and others. Of these we were best acquainted with Mr. D. J. Beachy, or "Dan" as we used to call him when he attended school in Grantsville, Md., before the war. All were born and reared in this county and all members of the Amish persuasion. Mr. Daniel J. Beachy has but two sons, one of whom conducts his fine farm near Arthur. He has retired from active business and is paying more attention to his health than any thing else. We were indeed very glad to meet them all.—Meyersdale Commercial.

Landlord's Tough Steak.

Charles Crockett, of Davy, McDowell county, W. Va., recently became the plaintiff of a lawsuit which beyond a doubt unique in the legal annals of the State.

Crockett boarded for eight months at the only restaurant in town. About four months ago he became aware that rheumatism had fastened upon the wrist of his right arm. He noticed that he experienced the most painful periods during meal hours, and especially when attempting to cut the beefsteak provided by the manager of the restaurant.

He became convinced that the affliction was superinduced by the aggravating and incessant sawing necessary to the cutting of the beefsteak. His physician encouraged this view of the matter, and Crockett was induced to enter suit in the McDowell county circuit court for $1,000 damages.—Ex.

MARCHED THROUGH GARRETT.

General Braddock's Campaign against the Indians 150 Years Ago.

T. J. C. Williams writes editorially in a Baltimore paper concerning Braddock Heights in Frederick county and how this resort, which has recently come prominently into the public notice, took its name: "A party of Hagerstown newspaper folk has been trolley riding across two mountains and intervening valleys to Braddock's Height and Frederick and has discovered a region comparable with the Delectable Mountains and the Land of Beulah. The electric road that connects the two fine Western Maryland towns of Frederick and Hagerstown, crosses South Mountain a little north of Turner's Gap, where the battle of South Mountain took place, runs down into Middleton and then closely follows the old Western turnpike, which connects Baltimore with the National road at Cumberland. Braddock Heights gets its name from the fact that it was the end of the first day's march after General Braddock left Frederick. In Frederick General Braddock and a portion of his army were detained for a considerable time while wagons were gathering to carry his army stores westward. Frederick county then extended from Baltimore and Prince George's counties to the western extremity of the province. There were few settlements west of South Mountain. Hagerstown had not been laid out and the oldest settlement in what is now Washington county was not more than 20 years old. While Braddock was in Frederick swearing lustily because there were no proper wagons in Maryland for the transportation of his supplies, Col. George Washington, then but 24 years of age, was constantly in attendance upon him. He knew the country and chafed and fretted because Braddock would listen to nothing. Then came Dr. Benjamin Franklin and played the courtier sent by Penn to serve the British General and England a good report of the loyalty of Pennsylvania. Franklin gathered the necessary wagons and pack horses in the rich region west of Philadelphia, giving his personal pledges to the farmers for their safe return. He also had the Pennsylvania legislature present to each officer in the British Army a box of provisions and supplies, including costly wines and delicacies. When Braddock finally moved he marched his red-coated veterans along the track where he went straight across to the Potomac at Conococheague settlement, now the town of Williamsport, 12 miles distant, Braddock's route through South Mountain is a notable one. He passed through Turner's Gap, through which shortly after his defeat all the settlers west of the mountain who escaped the tomahawk fled for safety, and Thomas Cresap and his men marched back and forth. Over the road which was made in this gap Andrew Jackson, Henry Clay, William Henry Harrison, Zachary Taylor, Thomas H. Benton, Sam Houston and Davey Crockett were frequently travelers, and Washington passed through there more than once. In September, 1862, the Army of Northern Virginia, under Lee, marched through the gap, and following close behind was McClellan and his great army was halted there for a whole day by a detachment of Confederates left to impede them. Through this gap the next July marched General Meade at the head of his victorious army from Gettysburg. There are few places in the land with a more interesting history than Frederick county. And yet the city is better known in the country from the Barbara Frietchie fable than from the great events of history connected with. The county is well farmed, well improved and beautiful beyond description."

Josiah's Good Reign.

The pendulum of national life in Judah swung often to heathenism and staid there inveterately. Some powerful personality must needs rise to neutralize the magnetism before the chosen people could return to even the semblance of the pure faith. Such a condition now maintained. There were horses and chariots dedicated to the planets, and priests were burning incense to all the host of heaven. Sexual force also was defied, and phallic signs and symbols were displayed. Idolatry was dominant in Church and State. As the northern kingdom was practically blotted out, and the places of the exiles taken by pagan foreigners, the whole of Palestine was to all intents submerged by the polluting streams from heathen fountains.

It was the hand of a young man that was to loosen the pendulum of national life from the magnet of heathenism. It proved on uncommonly skillful hand as well as a resolute and strong one.

Josiah was a lily on a dunghill. He exhaled the fragrance of a pure spirit above the lascivious putrescence of his times. He donned purple at eight years, and straigatway gave himself to God. History is silent about the influences which immediately surrounded him. But as his father is known to have been a contemptible weakling, it is supposed that this is another instance in which the hand that rocked the cradle ruled the world. Aside from this there were few advantages in the boy's environment. There was no Bible for the Book of the Law was lost. There was no regular public worship of Jehovah. It had been two hundred years since any repairs had been put upon the temple. It was practically in ruins and the ritual suspended.

Yet in the darkness of the hour the rare and radient flame of the pure theistic faith shone out, and that not with an intermittent or waning luster, but with an ever-augmenting radiance. The young king was not simply negatively good; he was positively aggressive against evil. He was not only pious, he was powerful. The record is significant. At eight years he began to reign, and at the same time seek after the God of his fathers. When he had reigned twelve years he began to purge Judah. He thought that what was worth doing at all was worth doing well. He also gave personal attention to the work. It was done in his presence. Down came the high places. with their altars. The images, both carved and molten, were pulverized and strewn upon the graves of those who had worshiped them in sign of the importance of that worship. One other object lesson was given. It was made necessary by the crudity of the age. Graves of the priests of Baal were opened and their bodies burned upon the very altars at which they had officiated. The young reforming king carried his havoc of heathenism even into the almost forsaken northern kingdom. In the ruins of the chief cities of four of the tribes, at least, he did that which he had done in Judah. Only when his program was finished did he return to his own capitol.

Six years later, as a natural consummation. he undertook the great task of repairing of the temple—the money and material having been collected in the interval, and all the plans matured. He showed great and practical wisdom in associating the public officials with himself. All should see and know that this was a national undertaking and not a private enterprise of the king. The narrative indicates an orderly method of procedure, and the overseers are honored by having their names entered in the sacred record. "And the men did the work faithfully." Significant! Sufficient!

Josiah shares the laurel with Hezekiah. These two kings of Judah, among all of them, were in all respects worthy to successors of David, their father. It is a very simple, but under all the circumstances, a very expressiye notation. "They did right. They turned neither to right nor left."

Key and Analysis.

1. Attraction of heathenism to Israel. Dominant in this epoch.

2. Acheivement of a young man. Youthful king, Josiah, counteracts the influence of heathenism. His personality and life story.

3. Destructive effort — altars, images, groves, etc.

4. Constructive effort—repair of the temple.

The Teacher's Lantern.

An American professor signalized his departure to take the chair in Oxford to which he had been invited by the extravagant assertion, that men over sixty did nothing comparatively, and that the world's work that was worth while was mostly done by men under forty.

The spectacular pronouncement has had the ridicule it deserved, but it has, at the same time, served to call attention to the fact that youth should be encouraged to do, and not be too long retarded in processes of preparation. George Eliot's caution against being worn out on the way to great ideas needs to be heeded.

* * * * *

A long catalogue is that which records the achievements of young men and women. A few examples only are here given. Mozart filled all the world with unearthly melody before he was thirty-five, and Raphael gave us all his glowing canvases before he reached that age. Luther was thirty-four when he nailed his theses on the church door. William Cullen Byrant wrote "Thanatopsis" when he was nineteen. Garfield was a college professor at twenty-six. Edison became the wizard before thirty-five. Summerfield preached all his sermons before he was twenty-seven. Wm. Nichols Crouch composed his serenade, "Kathleen Mavourneen," at nineteen. The author of "Die Wacht am Rhein" was twenty-one when he wrote it.

The world has just celebrated the one hundreth anniversary of the death of the poet Schiller. It has not forgotten the early influences brought to bear upon his genius; namely, his father's high character and learning, and his mother's own poetic fervor and her sympathy with her son's aspirations. In the case of the young king, Josiah, it was probably his mother only who guided him toward his high career.

* * * * *

Every boy and girl is an heir-apparent to a kingdom. It is not a realm of gold lace and empty functions, but a kingdom of character and service. Clear vision of this—careful preparation for it—courageous entrance upon it is the only genius royalty.

* * * * *

There is a subtle meaning in the original Hebrew word translated "destroyed"—"the houses which the king of Judah destroyed"—literally "destroyed by neglect." They did not need to raise iconoclastic hands against the sacred building. All that was necessary was to leave it alone. To cease repairs. It cost as much as would build a small cathedral every year to keep St. Peter's in Rome in repair. And other things besides buildings can be "destroyed by neglect.

* * * * *

The vacuum must be filled. When Josiah had emptied the land of paganism he filled it with theism and restored the worship of Jehovah. It is not enough to destroy evil. One must go on to construct good.

* * * * *

Here is a fine example of organization and co-operation. Josiah did not attempt to do the work single handed; he associated others with him and proceeded by a carefully arranged program.

* * * * *

Josiah had a political purpose and ambition as well as religious. His tour into the Northern Kingdom indicates that he hoped for a restoration of the ancient limits of the monarchy, and the conditions seemed favorable, for at that very time the Assyrians were losing power before the Medes.

When Elkins Hustled Freight.

"There was a time" said Senator Scott, of West Virginia to some friend in Washington recently, "when my colleague Elkins was a hustling young freight agent in New Mexico. His office was a box car and the principal troubles were in making the receipts of freight taliy with his bills of lading. One day he had a car load of household furniture switched to his siding. The seal of the car was quickly broken, as young Elkins then, as now, always liked to keep up with his work. He was greeted with the bray of an ass as the door slipped back on its rollers. The bill of lading was at once scanned, but there was nothing to show that the mule should be a passenger on this particular car. The goods were all checked out and then Elkins wired the general office thus:

"I'm a bureau short and a jackass long on carload of furniture"

"After a little delay the answer came: "All O. K. The bureau is a burro."

The Man Who Makes
A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE
Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.
All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

When the Brake Broke

By FRED OHLE

Copyright, 1905, by E. W. Sargent

The Flyaway coach stood at the curb in its glory of red and black. The four blacks that took the first stage were champing their bits and throwing flecks of foam on the admiring group of idlers, while Spencer Graul in smart coaching rig stood on the hotel steps.

Graul attracted almost as much attention as the well set up coach, for there was something curious in the idea of a millionaire driving a coach in which all might ride who had the $10 for a ticket.

Graul and Tom Montgomery had set up the coach to awaken interest in four-in-hands. The run was to a river resort thirty miles up, where lunch was covered by the price of the ticket, and back to town again.

The papers had taken up the idea, and the runs of the Flyaway were booked far ahead. Graul had glanced idly over the booking list and had found thereon only one well known name. The others were all people whom he did not know, and he wondered whether he would ask Millicent Kent to occupy the box seat with him.

She and her mother were the only passengers he knew, and Graul thought he should give her the seat of honor, though he knew that she was deathly afraid of horses and was making the trip only because it was considered the proper thing to do.

He was still arguing when a little figure in gray darted past him and accosted one of the grooms standing at the horses' heads. The groom pointed to Graul, and that gentleman knew that she had asked for the driver.

The girl came toward him, and Graul noted approvingly that she was more than ordinarily pretty.

"Please," she asked, with a trace of western accent, "I want to ride on the box with you. May I? Do say yes."

There was a witchery in the eager eyes, and as she danced back into the hotel Graul was glad that Miss Kent was not to ride with him. He followed the girl into the hotel and looked over the booking list again.

"BEAT 'EM BY A CAR LENGTH!" SHE CALLED JUBILANTLY.

"Who is that girl in gray?" he asked the clerk. That functionary smiled.

"Daisy Redmond," he answered. "Her father's the big mining man. She booked a seat all alone because he hangs out down in the street. Told me she wanted to see if these eastern dudes could hold a candle to western drivers."

Graul nodded and went outside. It was time to be starting, and he motioned to the guard with the ladder. Miss Redmond flashed past him.

"Ready!" she cried, and a moment later, to the intense amusement of the crowd, she had climbed over the wheels and was perched upon the box.

Through the crowded streets the pace was necessarily slow, and the girl turned to Graul. "Do you let them out when you hit the highroad?" she demanded eagerly. Graul laughed.

"I fancy you will get speed enough when we get going. This is just through downtown."

"I should hope so," she retorted. "I booked for a coach, not a hearse."

"I suppose you will write back to the papers that the eastern dudes are undertakers," he laughed. She flashed a quick glance at him.

"You've been talking to the clerk," she announced. "I am curious to see the difference."

"What do you think so far?" he asked.

"I think," she answered, "that if you ever hit the streets of an Arizona town with that yellow coat on you'd be sorry."

"Still," he defended, "we can drive on here."

"Maybe," she said ambiguously.

After they reached the open country it was apparent from her glances that she was changing her opinion, and Graul wondered if the drivers she knew of could cut figure eights in the horse show ring such as had gained him a blue ribbon three years in succession.

"Think a tan coat is necessarily a hindrance to a driver?" he laughed, as they turned a narrow curve.

"You can drive some," she admitted, ungraciously, "but these are nice, polite roads and trained horses."

"Here's a nasty bit," he said, pointing with his whip.

Just beyond lay a sharp descent, which crossed the railroad tracks at the foot of the hill. The road was rough with the erosion of the spring thaws, and Graul came to a full stop as he reached the brow.

"Hank Whittlesby would have taken it full tilt," she teased, as she noted the precaution. Graul laughed, as the horses moved slowly forward.

He threw on the brake with care as the wheels began to grind in the gravel. He hated this bit of road when he had passengers on board. He always felt that if anything happened it would be right here.

And his fears were verified, for scarcely had they gone ten feet when, with a report like that of a gun, the brake rod broke and the terrified horses sprang into their collars.

This prevented him from turning them into the side of the road and stopping them. He would have to do the best he could now.

The girl gave a startled cry, and for an instant he wondered why she should scream, when a gray clad arm extended across his vision, now glued upon the road ahead.

The railroad tracks crossed the road just at the foot of the hill, and a fast freight had just come into sight around a curve. Graul knew that if he did not cross the track before the train reached the crossing he would smash into it and probably kill every one on board.

Instead of trying to check the horses he gave them their heads and used the whip, urging them to greater speed.

The light coach bounced and tossed over the heavy ruts, while the terrified passengers on the rear seats clung to the arms and added to the confusion with their screams. Only Daisy, her feet braced against the dashboard, was quiet.

With a bang they struck the foot of the hill. There was a sharp rattle as they crossed the tracks, and Daisy swung around in her seat.

"Beat 'em by a car length!" she called jubilantly. "Hank couldn't have done better than that himself."

"Then you are ready to admit that we eastern dudes can drive?" He smiled at her as the horses slowed to a walk in the heavy sand.

"Admit it!" she echoed. "You're a wonder, and any time you want to come out west I'll recommend you to the stage company."

"I think," said Graul, "that when I get out west it will not be in search of a job, but in quest of some one to sit on the box seat with me."

Daisy looked at him keenly. He was not flirting, she felt with a thrill. He meant it.

"If you drive all around as straight as you do on the box," she said soberly, "I'll give you a recommendation for that."

The fact that they are to be married next month argues that he is an all around good driver.

As the East Indian Sees It.

A native of India who lost a large amount of money through the insolvency of an English merchant explained the English insolvency laws as follows: "In Burma the white man who wants to become insolvent goes into business and gets lots of goods and does not pay for them. He then gets all the money he can together—say, 30,000 rupees (a rupee is 33 cents)—and puts all of it except 100 rupees away where no one can find it. With the 100 rupees he goes to a judge of the court and tells him he wants to become bankrupt. The judge then calls all the lawyers together, likewise all the men to whom the white man owes money, and says, 'This man is insolvent, but he wishes to give you all that he has got, so he has asked me to divide this 100 rupees among you all.' The judge thereupon gives the lawyers 90 rupees and the remaining 10 rupees to the other men. Then the insolvent goes home to England."

Writing With Milk.

In the course of a trial in France a letter was read from a man named Turpin, a chemist, under sentence of five years' imprisonment as a spy, giving directions to a friend, with a view to establishing a secret correspondence with him while in prison. This led to an official inquiry on the subject by the French authorities, and some strange revelations were obtained from some of the convicts.

It appears that when information has to be conveyed to a prisoner a formal letter, containing apparently nothing but a few trivial facts of a personal nature, is forwarded to the prison. This is read by the governor, who stamps it and allows it to be handed to the man to whom it is addressed. The latter is aware, however, that there is another letter to be read within the lines, this being written in milk and being easily decipherable on being rubbed over with a dirty finger.—Chambers' Journal.

The First Wills.

Wills were at first oral, as were also gifts of land, and were only morally binding on the survivors. Origen and other fathers of the early church credited Noah with having made a will, and in the fourth century the bishop of Brescia declared all those heretical who denied Noah's division of the world to his three sons by will. The oldest known wills are those of Egypt. Both oral and written wills not infrequently contained imprecations on those who should neglect them. The earliest written will in existence is that of Sennacherib, which was found in the royal library of Konyunjik. There is a great sameness about our own royal wills. They mainly relate to beds, bedding, clothes, personal ornaments, gold and silver cups and payments for masses, and are generally as prosaic as one could contrive.

EXCURSIONS TO THE WEST

To the Pacific Coast—to California, Oregon, Washington—round-trip, long transit and return limits, liberal stop-over privileges.

The rate is practically on the basis of one fare for the round trip. Of course, if you wish to visit both California and Oregon or Washington, the cost is slightly more.

These reduced rates are in effect on certain dates in months of May to October, inclusive. They apply from all Eastern points via Chicago, St. Louis or Memphis gateways. The Rock Island System will take you up in either Chicago or St. Louis, or at hundreds of other Middle West points and carry you to the Coast in through Standard or Tourist Sleepers with unexcelled Dining Car service. The Rock Island also affords a choice of routes: on the "Scenic" route you go via Colorado—see Salt Lake City—visit Yellowstone Park, or the "Southern" route you can go via El Paso and the Southern Pacific, then "up coast" to San Francisco and/or Los Angeles, as desired.

In short, these excursions offer an unusually good chance to see our country in a comprehensive manner.

If you decide to go as far as Colorado, there are excursion rates in effect to that section and return, all summer long, specially reduced June 30 to July 4, August 12 and 13, and August 30 to September 4. Extension trips to Ogden or Salt Lake and return at low cost also.

From September 15 to October 31, 1905, one-way tourist or "colonist" tickets will be on sale to California and the Pacific Northwest—about half regular fare.

If interested, send name and address on this coupon, designating which booklet wanted and to what point you plan to go. Name probable date of start also, so we can advise definitely with respect to rates, etc.

A Discreet Servant.

A certain duke was dining in full kilt dress at a highland anniversary dinner, his piper standing behind his chair. At dessert a very handsome and valuable snuffbox belonging to one of the guests was handed round. When the time came to return it to its owner the snuffbox could not be discovered anywhere. A search was made, but with no result, the duke being especially anxious about it.

On the next anniversary he again donned the kilt—which he had not worn in the interval—for the annual dinner. As he was dressing he happened to put his hand in his sporran and there, to his astonishment, found the box which had been lost at the last year's dinner. He turned to his piper and said:

"Why, this is the snuffbox we were all looking for! Did you not see me put it away in my sporran?"

"Yes, your grace."

"Then why did you not tell me?" demanded the duke.

"Because I thought your grace required the little matter kept quiet," responded the piper, with a knowing wink.

Unconsciously Funny Ads.

"Humor," says Mr. Crothers, "is the frank enjoyment of the imperfect." Yes, but not of imperfect fun. And I find the advertiser most deliciously amusing when he least aspires to be. I frankly enjoy his laughterless and unconscious imperfections. "Miss Ellen Terry will positively appear in three pieces," writes he, or "Try our patent lamp chimney and save half your light," or even, "Our fish cannot be approached." A correspondence school of advertising declares in its enthusiastic prospectus, "You will never see the ad. writer play the wall flower in society." And, good lack, why should he? I will pledge my all to find admirers for any author of unwittingly humorous advertisements. Indeed I dare say Mr. Crothers himself would be proud to fellowship with such a one and "frankly enjoy his imperfections," though methinks he would perhaps reserve the right to order his own affairs without assistance from so devious and humorless an intellect.—Atlantic.

Beyond Hope of Rescue.

Bound hand and foot and gagged, the maiden was put into the gunny sack and, unable to move or scream, felt herself being carried down a flight of stairs, put into a buggy and then driven down the street. Ineffectually she tried to release herself from the gag. Alas, she was bound too securely! Finally the conveyance stopped. She was again carried into a building, fainting and gasping for breath. The sack was taken from her head. The villain, still masked, took the gag from her mouth, her eyes gleaming like coals of fire through his black mask, released her and hissed through his tightly clinched teeth: "There, my pretty bird, scream and yell as loud as you like; no human ear will ever reach you. You are in my power. Do you hear—totally within my power!" "Where am I?" she gasped. "In a store that never advertises," was the cruel response. "Alas, alas!" she moaned. "No power on earth can save me; no one will look for me here." And the poor girl fainted.—Red Creek (N. Y.) Herald.

MACHINE'S HEAVY BLOW

Gorman Organization Overthrown By Blair Lee, An Opponent Of The Poe Amendment.

Blair Lee's decisive victory over Spencer C. Jones in the Montgomery county primaries last Saturday, where both sought the Democratic nomination for the State Senate, is the most direct blow yet received by the Poe disfranchising amendment and the Gorman organization in the counties of Maryland.

Mr. Lee is opposed to the amendment; Spencer C. Jones, as President of the Senate of Maryland at the last session of the Legislature, when the amendment was adopted for submission to the people, was instrumental in having it passed and acquiesced in the attitude of the party bosses toward Governor Warfield. Moreover, in the contest for the United States Senatorship he cast his fortunes with Mr. Bernard Carter, the personal candidate of Senator Arthur P. Gorman, in preference to either Mr. Isidor Rayner or Governor Smith, both of whom had a following among the people, although Mr. Rayner was undoubtedly the choice of the majority of the voters.

With one stroke the Democrats of Montgomery by a decisive majority of 700, when only 4000 votes were cast, express their disapproval of the Poe disfranchising amendment and give Senator Gorman no gentle intimation that his sway is unwelcome where once it was supreme.

On every hand it is asserted that the blow dealt in Montgomery was not in animosity to the courteous, affable Mr. Jones, for whom very few entertain any but kindliest feeling. It was at the machine to which Mr. Jones lent himself as the main prop and the disfranchising amendment designed to perpetuate its power that the voters aimed. The machine in the counties means Senator Gorman, since his wishes with it has always been supreme. The opposition chose a strong man, upon whom they centred their strength. With him as their standard-bearer they wrested control from the clique which sought to dominate politics in Montgomery. The ticket that won with Mr. Lee is composed mainly of men who are of his own way of thinking.

It is not believed that Mr. Lee is an independent in the sense that the word is sometimes used. He has no personal feeling against Senator Gorman, nor will he necessarily ally himself with any movement that strikes at the State boss. He is, however, a man of the kind that Mr. Gorman most fears. While standing squarely on the plank of party regularity, he will claim the privilege of thinking and acting for himself. The word of Mr. Gorman will not be law with him. He is a man of convictions which he is not afraid to advocate, no matter how unauspicious the occasion may be. Men of this kind have always been a thorn in Mr. Gorman's side.

While Mr. Lee was winning his victory in Montgomery, Senator Gorman exhibited those traits of character which has brought him into dislike with the party workers in recent years. Spencer Jones had often sacrificed his personal views in order to gratify the State chieftain. In the Senatorial fight he voted contrary to the wishes of the people of Montgomery in order to put himself more securely in the good graces of the State boss. Mr. Gorman was not properly appreciative of this sacrifice. Perhaps he saw in the success of Mr. Jones a possibility of him looming up as a strong candidate for the Governorship. Past favors were forgotten. Afraid of Mr. Lee and envious of Mr. Jones, he shilly-shallied until Mr. Lee, who had gathered about himself the elements opposed to the Gorman machine and the Poe disfranchising amendment, was so far in the lead that it was impossible to overtake him. With the opposition that is developing throughout the counties to the Gorman machine any move of the Senator's would have hurt the cause he espoused, but the wiley old boss will now seek to bring Mr. Lee into camp by trying to persuade him that his victory was, after all, due to his non-interference in the contest. The friends of Mr. Lee say he is not a man to be caught in a trap of this kind.

The defeat of Mr. Jones means, too, the reorganization of the State Senate, no matter which party wins. A new President will have to be selected for the Senate. The President of the Senate is virtually the Lieutenant Governor of the State. This office is now occupied by Mr. Jones. The next Legislature will choose his successor. In case Mr. Thomas H. Robinson of Harford is returned to the State Senate the honor will probably be conferred upon him. Mr. Robinson however, has a fight on hands. He is opposed in the primaries in Harford by four candidates. It is believed, however, that he will win easily. The Republicans will make a determined fight to beat him in the general election. They will concentrate their powers, it is thought, solely against Mr. Robinson and the disfranchising amendment.

AN EXCELLENT TICKET NOMINATED

By the Republican Convention Which Met in Oakland Tuesday Afternoon.

W. McCULLOUGH BROWN FOR STATE SENATOR.

He is a Man Among Men and a Representative Citizen, Clean Morally and Politically, Whose Candidacy Adds Strength to the Already Strong Ticket—Resolutions and Proceedings of the Convention—Mr. Scott T. Jones as Chairman, Made An Excellent Presiding Officer.

The Republican convention for the purpose of nominating a Legislative and county ticket to be voted for in November, was held in the court room in Oakland Tuesday, being attended by representative Republicans from every district with full delegations.

The delegates arrived in town during Monday afternoon and evening coming on the trains and by the roads from their respective homes. During Monday night much political work was done by the candidates themselves and their friends, the favorite place for congregating being along the pavements on Second street which were crowded well into the night.

Tuesday morning at eleven o'clock, the hour agreed upon for assembling of the delegates, Mr. Patrick E. Finzel, secretary of the retiring county committee, called the convention to order, calling for nominations for chairman of the convention. Mr. Scott T. Jones, of Oakland, was placed in nomination and was unanimously elected to the position. His election presaged a harmonious gathering and his rulings were well taken and received with excellent grace. Messrs. J. Arthur DeWitt, of District No. 5, and George W. Engle, of District No 12, were made the secretaries.

Following the election of the officers of the convention a committee on rule resolutions and credentials composed of one member from each district was chosen. A delegation contesting the seats of the delegation headed by M.. N. U. Bond from District No. 4, and favoring the saating of the delegates favorable to County Commissioner Stump and R. A. C. Howard for State Senate, was determined by the committee in favor of Mr. Bond's delegation.

At this juncture the convention adjourned until 2 o'clock in the afternoon when the delegates went into caucus, very graciously allowing the newspaper men to remain for the purpose of reporting the proceedings.

Chairman Jones received the report of the committee on rules, which was read and also that of the committee on credentials, accrediting the following as being entitled to seats in convention:

District No. 1—Albert L. Lee, George Bray, John L. Fitzwater, J. A. Wright, Louis Littman.

District No. 2—Jacob S. Myers, J. B. Thomas, Charles Kamp, William Hollinger, Nathen R. Selby.

District No. 3—Ralph Engle, C. D. Hershberger, C. C. Durst, G. J. Gnagey, Charles Younkin.

District No. 4—N. U. Bond, Grant Hershberger, Dr. H. M. Kemp, Henry Barnard, Floyd Duckworth.

District No. 5—James W. Friend, H. J. Speicher, Charles C. Speicher, J. A. DeWitt, Peter Brown.

District No. 6—Robert L. Friese, Richard Friend, David W. Fraker, Horace R. DeWitt, Henry Sines.

District No. 7—E. A. Weimer, Edward J. Frantz, Perry Bittinger, Andrew Shartzer, W. A. Maffett, Joseph Rathbun, W. S. Friend, Jasper Enlow, F. P. Arnold.

District No. 8—Charles E. Hilleary, Jonas Yutzy, Elliot C. Harvey, James Chisholm, W. P. Lee.

District No. 9—Patrick E. Finzell, Albert Bolden, F. A. Warner, Richard McKinzie, J. E. Frazee.

District No. 10—A. M. Jeffries, Martin V. Flanigan, F. L. Warnick, F. B. Casteel, James B. Shockey.

District No. 11—Willian P. Hansel, James Merrill, Jonas Wampler, Jacob A Strickland, A. J. Broadwater.

District No. 12—George W. Engle, Thomas B. Wiley, Silas O. Wiley, Joel Orendorf, Jonas Bittinger.

District No. 13—James E. Chappel, Artemus C. Smith, H. L. Price, John H. Rafter, A. C. Lyon.

District No. 14—Simon Myers, Joseph Tritchler, Joseph A. Kisner, George M. Brown, U. G. Palmer.

The preliminaries having been arranged nominations for the State Senate were declared in order when the following were placed before the convention: N. U. Bond, James A. Hayden, W. McCulloh Brown and U. G. Palmer. Mr. Bond withdrew his name prior to the balloting and on the first ballot Mr. Brown was declared the nominee.

For House of Delegates Nathan R. Selby, C. J. Otto, N. U. Bond, Patrick E. Finzell and Charles Ashby were nominated. The balloting resulted in the nomination of Messrs. Selby and Ashby.

Clerk of the Circuit Court E. Z. Tower was nominated by acclamation, no other candidate being placed before the convention.

For Sheriff Messrs. A. L. Lee and Andrew Shartzer were named, resulting in the nomination of Mr. Lee on the first ballot by a decisive vote.

For County Treasurer W. E. Hollinger, Horace DeWitt, P. B. Gough, and Jacob A. Strickland were placed before the convention. Mr. DeWitt was nominated on the first ballot.

For County Commissioners the result of the ballot nominated Messrs. Asa B. Friend and Artemus C. Smith. Other candidates were C. W. Friend, E. W. Kelso and Simon Myers.

Mr. Franklin P. Green was nominated by acclamation for County Surveyor.

Delegates to the State Convention, N. U. Bond, H. J. Speicher, W. McCulloh Brown, F. A. Warner, A. J. Broadwater, G. W. Engle, H. L. Price and C. J. Otto.

State Central Committee, Col. A. G. Sturgiss, Jacob S. Myers and Dr. H. M. Kemp.

The above nominations practically completed the work of the caucus and a motion was made and carried to go into convention, coupled with the resolution that the caucus nominees be binding upon the convention which was carried and the doors thrown open to the public.

Little work was left, however, for the convention to accomplish.

The report of the committee on resolutions was received and read, a motion was adopted thanking the officers of the convention for their devotion to duty and the convention was declared adjourned after the caucus nominations had been read.

The resolutions adopted are as follows:

We, the Republicans of Garrett county, in convention assembled, believing the interests of our common country are best subserved by the promulgation and practices of Republican principles espoused by the Republican party and as set forth in the platform of the last National convention, and past experience, present prosperity and future prospects intensifying this belief, hereby affirm our allegiance thereto.

We endorse the administration of President Roosevelt and his vigorous policy, foreign and domestic, and view with admiration that he has served the Republican party best by having worked for the highest good of each individual under the protection of our flag.

We condemn the proposed Poe Amendment as thoroughly un-American, un-Democratic and as a thrust at the free American manhood, both white and black, of the great Commonwealth of Maryland.

We endorse the administration of our public officials who have served us during the past.

Mr. Brown, the candidate for State Senate, is one of Garrett's representative citizens, a farmer and horticulturalist of large interests. By profession Mr. Brown is a civil engineer and conducted the field work in the recent boundary line surveys between the States of Maryland and West Virginia and between Alleganv and Garrett counties. He is a man above reproach in everything—business, politics and morals. His candidacy brings strength to the ticket throughout and every voter can conscientiously support him.

Messrs. Selby and Ashby, for the House of Delegates, are both to "the Manor born," their ancestors for many generations being residents of Garrett county. While Mr. Ashby has served one term in the House where his record is clear, Mr. Selby has never been before the people prior to this time. Both gentlemen will make creditable representatives of the peoples' interest at Annapolis.

For Clerk of the Circuit Court Mr. Edward Z. Tower, who has served for so many years in the same capacity needs no introduction to the people of Garrett county. He is one among the best officials of the State, obliging, courteous and painstaking in all his work.

Mr. Albert L. Lee, the nominee for Sheriff, is a son of the late Abraham Lee, of near Swanton. He was born in District No. 10 and at an early age went to work for himself. At twenty-three while engaged as a railroad brakeman he had the misfortune to loose his left arm in an accident. He then sought and obtained an education through his individual efforts and is classed as one of the leading public school teachers of the county. He is deserving of the support and goodwill of both Democrats and Republicans at the polls.

Mr. Horace R. DeWitt, of Sang Run District, the nominee for County Treasurer, is a successful business man of his section, being engaged in the general mercantile business which has been his occupation for a number of years. He is a native of the county and his friends in all parts of the county are legion.

Messrs. Asa B. Friend, of Accident District, and Mr. Artemus C. Smith, of Kitzmillersville District, nominees for County Commissioners, are both in the prime of life, active, intelligent and observant. Mr. Friend is a native of the county having been born and reared at the place he now resides. Mr. Smith, a carpenter by trade, has been a resident of the county for years, his former home being in Preston county, West Va.

Mr. F. P. Green, this County Surveyor, has served in the same capacity for a number of years and is well known throughout the county as a good official.

The Teacher's Aim.

(Communicated.)

Dear Fellow Teachers of Garrett County: As the time for the schools to open is rapidly approaching, it is orderly and timely that we consider a few things which make for our comfort and success.

First of all we must have an aim—a worthy, laudable aim!

An aimless effort is a worthless one; and an aimless life, like a ship without a rudder, is liable to be lost upon the sea of time and destined to final destruction amid the treacherous reefs of death. But the person who has for his polar star a proper aim in the sky of hope always succeeds.

It is not the purpose of this article to criticise our frailties in the school room; but designed rather to speak to us encouragingly along certain lines which tend to magnify our profession and culminate in the good of the children under our care, and thus lighten the work of the teachers and result in greater good to the pupils.

There are two errors into which we are liable to fall. They are unnoticed by the half teacher (you know there are whole teachers; one half teachers, one third teachers, etc., to zero teachers) but to the wide awake teacher they are obvious and painful.

The first is "keeping school" with no intention of good to the pupils, looking only to our own interest, and thus miss the good both to ourselves and them; for we help ourselves by helping others and harm ourselves by harming others.

The second error is to be anxious to advance the pupils, but get the pedantic notion that we must impress the school and the entire community that we are finely educated, and that we can see through and understand four-thirds of all that books contain. This is one of the avenues to that fatal error of doing for the pupil what he should do for himself, thus cheating the pupil out of his real opportunity for mental growth. This mistake upon our path as teachers is fundamental and far-reaching.

I once knew a father who seldom harnessed a horse or drove a team, hence the boys did the work in his absence and by so doing became partially informed in farm work. The mother invariably did the bread making, dishwashing, etc., and the girls grew up to know but little about household duties. Thus the boys received a better preparation for life than the girl, but both father and mother erred in the training of their children, the father by not directing the efforts of the boys, and the mother by not having the girls do at least a part of the work under her supervision.

The teacher, like the dutiful parent, must have a deep rooted anxiety for the child's good and advancement, put him to work with a kindly oversigh to direct, encourage and stimulate him to efforts in developing and organizing his mental, physical and moral powers.

That school is a success whose pupils are busy along proper lines, and that teacher is doubly successful who has trained his pupils to organize and control their efforts in acquiring knowledge and skill to became useful in life.

The teacher's aim, therefore, should be the pupils' good.

Whatever else a teacher may be or do, he is a failure unless he has made his pupils better, stronger, happier and purer.

Of course, the teacher must understand the branches to be taught, but he should study the classwork and the pupils more.

Remember that one's success as teacher should not be measured by what he knows but by what he can get his pupils to know and do.

May each teacher strive to make his school a great center from which shall emanate much and lasting good during the session which is to open in September.

Cumberland Boy Pedestrians.

George Henderson, a son of Judge Henderson, of Cumberland and A. R. Cockran, son of a well known attorney at that place, passed through Hagerstown on Sunday on their way from Washington to Cumberland. Some time ago the young men started from Washington to Cumberland on a canal boat. Part of the trip they drove the mules of the boat, but this not being to their liking, they abandoned it and proceeded on foot. The entire trip from Washington to their home city is to be made by foot. The young men arrived in Hagerstown at noon, took dinner at the Baldwin and then proceeded on their long tramp.—Hagerstown Herald, Aug. 7.

ECLIPSES OF MOON AND SUN

Each Promises to Be of Interest to Scientists and Astronomers.

The chief astronomical events of this month are two eclipses, one of the sun and one of the moon, both of which are visible in the United States, says the Scientific American. The lunar eclipse comes first on the night of the 14th. It is partial, only about one-third of the moon's diameter being immersed in the shadow. The moon enters the penumbra at 8.09 P. M., Eastern standard time that is, at the moment an observer stationed at the proper part of the moon would first see the sun begin to disappear behind the earth. But it will not be till some time later that the darkening of the moon's southern limb will be apparent to the eye.

At 9.39 P. M. the moon enters the earth's shadow proper, from which all direct sunlight is excluded, and she continues to press further into it for an hour and then gradually moves out of it again, leaving it altogether at 1141, and gets clear of the penumbra at 1.12 A. M.

This eclipse is therefore very conveniently observable in one part of the world, but little information of scientific valne can be anticipated from it, thanks to the fact that the earth's atmosphere prevents the edge of the shadow from being sharply defined so that it is impossible to tell with any degree of accuracy when it reaches any given spot on the moon.

Far more important is the solar eclipse on the 30th, which is one of the most interesting ones for many years. It is a total eclipse of pretty long duration, and the line of central eclipse passes through several regions which are conviently accessible for observing parties.

The eslipse is total at sunrise in Manitoba, just north of the United States boundary. Thence the shadow sweeps eastward across Canada, north of the settled districts, and comes out on the Labrabor coast. It turns somewhat to the southward as it crosses the Atlantic and reaches land again on the Spanish coastnear Cape Finisterr e. Crossing Spain the shadow traverses the Mediterranean, passes near Tunis; enters the African desert, passes over the Nile near Assuan, and finally bids farewell to to the earth somewhere in Arabia, less than three hours after it began in Canada. The duration of the total phase is the greatest in Spain, where it is about three and three-quarters minutes, while it is about two and one-half minutes in Labrador, and a little less than three minutes in Egypt.

Several parties of atronomers are going to Labrador, and many more to stations in Spain and Algeria, so that a goodly store of observations may be expected, if only the weather behaves as well as it did in 1900, when the track of the shadow on the European side of the ocean was almost the same as at present.

Weather permitting a great deal of spectroscopic and other information about the sun's surrounding will undoubtedly be obtained. Perhaps the most interesting observations from an amateur's standpoint are those that will be in the search for a possible small planet near the sun than Mercury by photography of the whole region of the sky near the eclipsed sun. This has been done at several recent eclipses without result, only known stars being found on the plates; but the brilliant success of the photographic methods in finding new statellites makes one feel that the search for an intro-Mercurial planet ought to be continued a little longer.

IT IS PUBLICITY THAT IS FEARED.

The strongest force against any evil in this country today is newspaper publicity. There are men who will tell you that the newspapers often make public certain matters which ought not to see the light of day; that certain forms of evil are shown up to a degree more terrible, through the press, than they actually are. These men fear publicity. They know that public sentiment can be aroused more effectually by letting the public look behind the scenes than by any other agency. If an evil is to be overthrown, if it is to be eradicated from society, it must be shown up. The best citizens of this republic, who really have the good and welfare of the people at heart, seek to drive out every form of vice which is sapping the morals of the people. Publicity is the great weapon for the right. It is to be regretted that there are some journals, who through their desire for political prestige, and to court the favor of corporations or to have the popular ear of the unlawful element will not expose evils; will not give publicity to wrongs; but their influence lasts only for a time.

A Scant Fruit Year.

It now seems evident that this is to be a year of fruit scarcity in the eastern section of the United States, unless California comes to the rescue and ships the needed supplies clear across the Continent. The Georgia peach crop, which is now practically at the finish, was less than half as large as the crop of last year. In Eastern Maryland and Southern Delaware few peach orchards are in bearing this year, and this peninsula crop of the lucious fruit, which usually stocks the markets from Baltimore to Boston, and as far west as Buffalo, will be almost entirely missing. In isolated instances, where growers can gather a few scattering baskets from their orchards, they will be able to secure fancy prices. Other kinds of autumnal fruit are not in the usual abundance.

The United States is so varied in soil and climate that a universal fruit failure is of rare occurrence. There is not, of course, a universal fruit failure this year—there has been fruits in market contiuuously since January. There seems to be such a general shortage this year, however, that the fresh fruit supply has moved into the classification of luxuries from being the cheap summer commodity which it usually is. In modern times fruits have come into use as an article of diet to an extent that vastly exceeds the consumption of fifty or sixty years ago. Fruitgrowing in certain territories has become a staple industry. There are apples, pears and peach orchards that covers hundreds of acres, and strawberries and grapes are grown in like profusion and shipped to the city markets in carload lots. In this country especially have the arts of horticulture been developed and expanded. Fruits are not only supplied in abundance for fresh consumption to the cities, but they are extensively canned, preserved and evaporated, and in such form they enter largely into the export commodities that are sold abroad.

A general fruit failure is not quite so serious as an extensive shortage in wheat or in cotton, but it is a matter of serious moment, even when fruits are so scarce as to be high-priced and not cheap, as they usually are, in this country. If it should happen that we must import a considerable portion of our malic acid supply this year, that will be an unusual and somewhat deplorable circumstance.

THIS ONE KNEW WHAT TO SAY.

The Question of Weather Predictions Similar to the Problem of Dogs.

A fellow from up East writes to know which of the weather forecasts in the almanac is considered the best. He says a man out in St. Louis hits its occasionally, and a fellow down in Atlanta hits it occasionally, and he wants to know if one is better than the other.

When the late argument between the North and South broke out some time ago there was an old mountaineer living in eastern Tennessee who didn't want to get mixed up in it. He would never commit himself when the question of war was being discussed. He bought two hound pups and named one of them Abe Lincoln and the other Jeff Daais. When the Union sympathizers were around he would call Abe Lincoln out of the house, and when a bunch of rebels came around he would yell for Jeff Davis as if the dog was over on a neighbor's farm.

Folks were anxious to find out just how the fellow stood and a wise one in the neighborhood undertook to learn the mountaineer's sentiments. He called at his house one day, and said, "What's your dogs named, Jim."

"Abe Lincoln and Jeff Davis," Jim replied as he continued to whittle

"Which is the best dog, Jim?" the wise one asked, with a knowing twinkle in his eye.

Jim stopped wittling and scared a fly off the tip of his ear, and drawled, "Ain't either of 'em worth a darn."

ROADS OF SANDY-CLAY

How These Highways are Built in Southern States.

It is a matter of common observation that here and there in the southern states are to be found stretches of sandy-clay roads never known to be bad, says W. L. Spoon in the yearbook of the department of agriculture. This fact has led to a study of the reasons why such roads are always good. Numerous experiments have been made with varying results, but all indicate that the essentials to success in sand-clay road building are puddling and saturation. What is meant by puddling or mixing may be clearly understood by any one familiar with the operations in the process of brickmaking. The clay must be rendered homogeneous, and this can be done only by the addition of water during the process until the clay becomes plastic, like dough. The second essential is the addition, of sand to the point of saturation, but not beyond.

No sand-clay road can satisfactorily withstand the severity of public travel without having first been reduced to a compact homogeneous mass of sand and clay. Each grain of sand should be in touch with other grains on all sides. Such a condition cannot be secured without the agency of water. It is useless to roll a dry sand-clay road before it has been rendered homogeneous by the puddling process and the grains of sand have been brought into contact, with only the interstices between them filled with clay as a binder. The first operation is mixing; the second is rolling as the mixture dries. This forces the particles of sand together, and excess of clay tends to rise to the surface, rendering it sticky. This clay must in turn be sanded and the operations repeated until the surface has become hard and compact.

Many failures have been made in the building of sand-clay roads, and a few of the more common causes for these failures will be pointed out. The first cause of failure is the want of perfect drainage. The imperfections may be in the cross sectional drainage, the side ditches or the drainage of the subgrade or roadbed. It is customary to give to a sand-clay road a little greater crown than is usually given to a macadam road, especially where the grade is above 3 per cent. The subject of side ditches should have more careful consideration than is usually given in case of macadam roads. If the subsoil upon which the road is built is clay it is important that the bottom of the side ditches should be eighteen inches or more below the crown or middle of the traveled track. If on the other hand, the land is rolling and the subsoil is sand of considerable depth, thus giving perfect natural drainage to the roadbed, little or no ditch will be required.

Perhaps the most common error in drainage is the failure to drain properly and thoroughly all places where there are wet weather springs. If necessary, the roadbed must be changed so as to locate it upon dry ground, as even the deepest side ditches practicable may fail to give relief where such springs exist. It is important to avoid deep cuts and to carefully consider all probable sources of trouble. The writer has often seen old roadbeds with water oozing from all parts during a rainy season in spite of sufficient side ditches, the water even rising in the center of a twenty foot roadbed and standing on the surface or slowly running along the wheel tracks to the nearest mudhole. It should be remembered that water, beyond a very limited amount, adds nothing of value to the sand-clay road after it is completed. If water is always present, sand should be used without clay. Sand and water make a better road than sand and clay and water. In proof of this statement attention need only be called to the numerous places where water crosses the roads in sandy districts. Such fords are always comparatively solid.

Another cause of failure is the want of thorough mixing. There may be a proper amount of sand, and clay may be placed upon the road, yet if it is not thoroughly puddled and mixed to saturation in every place the road is not likely to withstand public travel. Some sections will break and become loose sand, while others will become muddy in wet weather and hard in dry weather. Such variations may occur every few feet and even at the same place one wheel track being in loose and the other in mud.

In northern sections frost is another cause of failure and one more difficult to deal with than any heretofore mentioned. Frost is temporarily destructive to a sand-clay road, and for that reason the mixture must extend below the frost line if the road is built on a clay foundation. Freezing disintegrates the sand-clay composition and makes of it a soft, slushy mud, which however, repacks again after each heavy rain, although frequently leaving the road surface somewhat rough. Therefore in general practice it is necessary to make the sand-clay mixture of such a depth as to extend a few inches below the frost line.

Other causes of failure are the improper section of clay and the improper treatment of the clay used. Ferruginous clays are the best, and chalky clays the poorest.

No road of any kind is likely to prove satisfactory unless drainage of the roadbed is carefully provided for, and especially is this true of a sand-clay road made of sedimentary clay and fine sand.

And behold some advertisers went forth to advertise. Some carried paint and brushes and besmeared the rocks, fences, gates and barns. The cows, horses and asses admired the artistic colors, and the small boys coved them with mud. Some carried posters both great and and small which fell by the wayside and were chewed up by billy goats, pasted on pantry shelves and used for other purposes. None of the advertising paid, and the advertiser snored aloud and sold not, while the advertiser who placed his advertisement in the local newspaper, where it was read by all, was kept busy selling goods and banking money.

TO PREVENT CRUELTY TO ANIMALS

Movement Set on Foot in Oakland to Curb this Crime.

A branch of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has been formed in Oakland with some earnest ladies at the head of the organization who will give their attention to drivers who illtreat their animals by over driving, under feeding or cruelly beating them.

The law in this respect deals severely with the offenders and gives powers to an officer or S. P. C. A. agents to make arrests, who, in their presence, engage in direct cruelty to animals.

Just at this season of the year when horse are in demand for conveying persons from Oakland to Mountain Lake Park and other points nearby, over zealous drivers of hacks and busses in many cases use poor judgment in the treatment of their horses and the ladies above referred to are determined to curb this practice.

JOHN H. SHOBER KILLED ON B. & O.

A Well Known Railroad Man Struck by an Overhead Bridge.

Mr. John H. Shober, a Baltimore and Ohio brakeman, son of Mr. W.F. Shober, 17 Pulaski street, Cumberland, was found dead on an engine tank at Altamont early last Thursday morning. Mr. Shober was brakeman on an eastbound train and it is believed by the other trainmen that he struck one of the overhead bridges as he passed through Oakland. The other men on the train knew nothing of their companion's injury until one of them came upon his dead body on the engine tank. The remains were taken to Keyser on the freight engine and held there until the arrival of the passenger accommodation from Grafton and were then sent to Cumberland and prepared for burial.

The body was afterward conveyed to the young man's home on Pulaski street. Deceased was twenty years of age and had been railroading only a short time.

Col. William Clark, of Grafton, is here visiting Mr. and Mrs. James W. Leathers at their home on Second Street.

PAUL JONES' GREAT FIGHT.

Graphic Description of the Capture of the Serapis by the Bohomme Richard.

An event of much historic interest, both in itself and because of the stirring incidents which it recalled, was the landing of the body of Commodore John Paul Jones, on American soil recently and its deposit in the temporary vault at Annapolis, which it is to occupy until it shall find a final resting place in the crypt of the Naval Academy Chapel. Commodore Jones' greatest fame was won in his fight with the British frigate Serapis off the coast of England, on the night of September 22, 1773, and the story forms one of the most interesting pages of the annals of the Revolutionary War. The Richmond, (Va.) Evening Journal published last Saturday the following description of it in the guise of a dispatch from a war correspondent on board the Serapis, written when the captured vessel reached the Texel, on October 3, 1773:

"The pride of Britain has been most thoroughly humbled by the unexampled victory achieved over one of her finest frigates, the Serapis, 44, by Commodore John Paul Jones, in the U. S. Ship Bonhomme Richard, after nearly three hours of the most desperate fighting ever seen on the narrow seas.

"The events of the cruise up to the middle of September, which has been brilliantly successful in spite of the continued insubordination of the captain, have been previously despatched to you. Early in the afternoon of Thursday, the 23rd of September, the Richard, the Pallas and the Alliance sighted the Baltic merchant fleet off Flamborough headland under convoy of two ships of war, one of which, it was discovered, was a two-decker. The Richard and the Pallas at once crowded sail to close with the enemy, who boldly interposed between us and the convoy flying in great confusion for the shelter of Scarborough harbor. The Alliance, whose captain, Landais, has been most mutinous and disobediedt throughout the cruise, was hull down to the southward and paid no attention to signals.

"The wind was light and variable and it was not until six bells in the second dog watch (7 P. M.) that we got within hail of the larger ship waiting for us about two leagues from the headland. Then edging seaward, and Alliance was still far astern, leaving us alone to engage our enemy, for which we were not unwilling, indeed, very eager. The sea was smooth as a mill pond, the light wind scarcely affording steerage way in the strong tide, The full moon in a clear sky gave plenty of light for our bloody work.

"As we ranged alongside, the commodore having skilfully got to windward, the enemy hailed, what ship is that? Ordering the helm to starboard, the commodore, to gain time, answered, 'I don't understand you.' The enemy hailed again, with a threat to fire, which we answered with a broadside. The response was prompt, and for the next few minutes we drifted along side by side a cable's length (600 feet) apart, exchanging a terrific fire, when a most lamentable catastrophe took place on our ship. Two of the six 18 pounders in the gun deck burst, killing nearly all the men stationed there and severely wounding Midshipman Mayrant, who had charge of them. As these were all condemned French guns, they were abandoned by order of Lieut. Richard Dale, the first officer. Mr. Mayrant, refusing to go below, volunteered for the gun deck battery.

"The fighting continued for some three-quarters of an hour, the two ships surging closer all the time. The heavier metal of the enemy, he being armed with eighteens against our twelve and nine, worked havoc in our main batteries. Nothwithstanding, our gallant fellows keep bravely to it, ever flinching and giving back shot as long as the guns would fire. It was evident that in this playing at long bowls the enemy was too heavy for us, and that we should be knocked to pieces and sunk unless we could close.

"The Richard, having forged ahead a little, the Commodore tried to lay her across the enemy's forefoot, but he having put up his helm, we ran him aboard his port quarter. Before the ship could be lashed he drew away and we lay in line ahead, and, no guns bearing, the combat quieted for a little space, until the Richard, forging ahead and the enemy backing, we got alongside once more, only closer, and the battle recommenced we giving and receiving terrible punishment. Finally, about 9 of the clock, we were within pistol shot of her, when the wind hauled ahead, enabling the Richard to blanket the enemy. At this point the Alliance ranged along our unengaged side and opened fire on us, to our great astonishment and horror. We cried our name and signaled to her, but to no avail. It was impossible she mistook us for the enemy, for the Richard was a black ship, the other a white one. After killing twelve men by her fire, including Mr. Caswell, she left us, thanking God for her departure.

"The enemy having lost way, the Richard drew ahead and the Commmodore promptlv laid her athwart the other's hawse. The enemy now backed his after sail, but only succeeded in swinging into us as we ranged along his starboard side. His bower anchor caught in our mizzen chains, grapnels were also thrown, and in a minute she was fast to us, the Commodore with his own hands passing the lashing. The enemy made desperate efforts to cut the anchor fastenings, in the hope of swinging clear, but man after man who tried it was shot down, the Commodore himself using the musquets of the marines with great effect. The two ships remained locked together and the fighting recommenced again.

"Below the enemy had it all his own way. Our gun deck was swept by shot so that the sides of the Richard were literally broken to pieces, and presently their shot sped harmlessly out to sea. Above, however, we had things our own way. Our French marines and soldiers, of which we had a great number, led by the commodore in person, poured a terrific musquetry fire upon the spar decks of the enemy, which soon drove the survivors in her crew below.

"Now the Alliance again made her appearance. We were in hopes that she would fall upon the other side of the enemy and thus end the battle. But no she deliberately sailed by her and raked us again with her broadside into our quarter, adding to the terrible damage we had suffered below. She then drew off again and approached us no more until after the battle.

"The condition of the Richard was deplorable. She was making water fast and was on fire. Some 200 British prisoners in the hold were now released by the master-at-arms under the apprehension that we were sinking. They at once rushed for the hatch-ways. The gunner became panic-struck and gained the deck crying 'Quarter.' The Commodore knocked him senseless with the butt of his pistol and when the enemy's captain, hearing the gunner's cry, asked if we had struck, the Commodore answered him. 'I have not yet begun to fight.' Whereat those of us who heard, cheered mightily and went at it again,

"Meanwhile, Lieutenant Richard Dale, than whom no commander had ever a better or a braver second, with incredible presence of mind and resource had got the British prisoners to man the pumps to keep the Richard from sinking. In this the Commodore seconded him, and the orderly had to shoot one of the prisoners before they would obey and get to the pumps. This left the Richard's men free to continue the fighting. By the Commodore's direction the unhurt nine-pounders on the quarter deck were now shifted over and their fire concentrated on the enemy's mainmast, which was soon tottering.

"There had been smart fighting aloft among the topmen since we grappled and our fellows had cleared the enemy's tops. The Commodore, observing this, and indeed nothing escaped him in that hot action, ordered grenades thrown on the enemy, which was most skillfully done by Midshipman Fanning. One grenade, falling through the after hatchway, kindled a pile of cartridges, which blew up, producing a great explosion and loss of life and terror among her people.

"The enemy was now seen to be on fire and our ship was both blazing and sinking at the same time. The case of both was desperate. There was no thought of striking on our part, however. The men were crazy with fight, especially the Frenchmen, the Americans being more steady, but not less resolute, and every man and boy inbued with the desperate determination of their Commodore.

Midshipman Mayrant, although suffering from a second wound, was now ordered to board the enemy, which he did most gallantly at the head of some two score men. He was wounded a third time by a pike thrust as he leaped on the rail, but shot the man dead that did it.

"The enemy's captain, now practically alone on deck, struck his flag with his own hand shortly after four bells and the battle was over. Lieutenant Dale, who was also wounded, at once took charge of the prize, which proved to be (formerly) H. B. M. S. Serapis, 44, Captain Richard Pearson, a ship outclassing the Bonhomme Richard by about five to three. Above 200 men of the Serapis' complement of over 300 were killed or wounded, and we lost of our own brave fellows near 150. The sufferings of the wounded were most terrible and many died on the run to this place, notwithstanding the skill and devotion of both the British and American surgeons. Full lists of the killed and wounded will be transmitted later.

"It is with great regret that I chronicle the further melancholy fate of our noble ship. She was so cut up and wrecked that in spite of every effort it was impossible to save her, and the second morning after the fight she sank, going down bow foremost with the fine silk American colors under which she fought, flying from her gaff end. The Commodore left the dead in her, vowing they could wish no better coffin. The prisoners say they never met such desperate fighting in which our men agree. They say they could sink us, but not conquered by Britain.

"The course of the Alliance is much censured in the squadron and 'tis believed that her captain will be court-martialed for cowardice and treason and receive the fate he so richly merits. Had he been disinclined to fight he yet had the helpless convoy at his mercy and could have sunk, burned or captured them at will. The Pallas, which somewhat overmatched her, took the other British ship, which proved to be the Countess of Scarborough, after a smart action of an hour and a half.

"Captain Pearson is much chagrined to be the first British captain that ever struck to an inferior force in single ship action from time immemorial. Commodore Jones will be remembered as a Scotsman by birth, a native of Virginia, appointed to the navy from North Carolina. His successful cruising in the Providence and the Alfred is not forgotten. Last year in the Ranger he took the larger and better armed sloop-of-war Drake after a brilliant action. All here are enthusiastic for him, and hope to see him fly his broad pendant over a fleet of ships of the line, to which his merits and achievements entitle him. Then let Britain beware."

Josiah and the Book of the Law.

The temple was a junk-shop. Its floors sagged hopelessly. There were wide breaches in its walls. all the fine gold had been stripped off to buy worthless truces with heathen invaders. All the goodly and significant articles of furniture had been crowded like lumber in the unoccupied rooms surrounding the courts, and their places had been filled with the altars and symbols of alien religions. The ritual of the Hebrew faith had ceased and the dust of civilization. the deposit incident to a great city, steadily accumulated in the unkempt building. Among other things which had disappeared in the two hundred years of neglect, was the yellow scroll of the law. If they had only known it that old parchment was the nation's palladium. If it had been preserved the kingdom would have been preserved. It was the written will of Jehovah. Obeyed, the scepter would not have departed. Aside also from its indescribably precious contents, it was a souvenir of the highest value. What hands had penned it! What eyes had scanned it! What lips had read it aloud to what wondering congregations! But its very existence had long since been forgotten, if not entirely, at least to the great mass of the people.

Quick and great were the gains of honoring Jehovah in the restoration of His temple, undertaken by the good king. In that crude age there were no safety deposit boxes or vaults. The custom of hiding treasures maintained. The high priest probably secreted the money collected for the work of repair. He probably put it under some of the old plumder in one of the unoccupied rooms. It was while ransacking the place for hidden treasure that he made the most remarkable find of that age. He unearthed the only, the long lost copy of the Bible. One tradition says it was beneath a heap of stones where it had been hidden from the destroying hand of Ahaz. Another says it was in the ark of the covenant which Manassah had tossed aside with sacriligious hands.

The results of this discovery were important and beneficent. A rule of life, both for individuals and the nation, was found. A standard of conduct and character, to which king and peasant, priest, civil and military officers, all alike might resort.

No wonder that at the first reading the king sprang to his feet and rent his clothes in regret and fear that the will of Jehovah had been so long and grossly neglected.

Because of the low standard of education which maintained in those comparatively crude days, need of an interpreter and interpretation was imperative. Some one with an inner light, a sense for the divine must needs be found. It was in this way that Huldah enters the trinity of women prophets and joins Miriam and Deborah.

Key and Analysis.

I. Condition of Temple and contents.

1. The scroll of the law. Its intrinsic value. Its value as a souvenir. Results of its loss.

2. The finding of the law. How. By whom. Under what circumstances.

3. Result of finding of the Law. In general. Upon the king in particular.

4. Need of an Interpreter. Whence it arose. Huldah.

The Teacher's Lantern.

It is an ancient story with modern application. There are many today to whom the Bible is as perfectly a lost book as it was to Josiah and his contemporaries. To them it is as if it had never been written. Out of sight it is out of mind.

* * * * *

The public display of the Bible on the sacred desk is to be commended. It is an exalting of the Word. An object lesson. In sight it is in mind.

* * * * *

Yet the Bible is never to be a fetch. The Bible is only God's vehicle. By it He comes to our minds and hearts. To worship the vehicle is idolatrous. If the Book could speak it would cry as the angel did to John, "See thou do it not."

* * * * *

The life is more than the book. It the ultimate analysia it is not so much what a man knows as what he is.

* * * * *

Interpretation of the Scripture is the distinct and important function of the Christian ministry today, as it was of the prophet in olden times. Not that the ministry has an exclusive monopoly of this function. Many unordained sons interpret skillfully. As general education increases, the need of specific interpretators decreases.

* * * * *

Here is an old-illustration of the principal which Jesus enunciate, that "he who does shall know." Josiah was "doing". It was when he began to repair the temple that he found the Book.

* * * * *

The Bible is a potent book. Its reading brings things to pass. It provokes either revolt or obedience. Josiah sought an interpreter to make its contents plain to him. Jehoiakim reached for a knife and cut it into shreds. The Bible receives the same opposite treatment to-day.

* * * * *

It should not be thought a thing incredible that the Bible was lost in that early and crude age, when those who could read it could be counted on one's fingers. The Bible was practically lost again in the Middle Ages, even in those seats of art and learning, the monasteries. It is said that Luther was twenty years old before he ever so much as saw a Bible.

SAW HISTORIC INCIDENT.

Mrs. Bedgar Witnessed Barbara Fritchie Wave Stars and Strioes.

Mrs. Bedgar, who lives at Overton, Westmoreland county, was born in Frederick, Md., nine years before the Civil war began. She saw Barbara Fritchie place the stars and stripes in her window, saying she defied the rebels to take them down. A rebel living in Frederick tore down the flag, but Barbara Fritchie placed another in the window.

Some people have asserted, that Whittier's poem entitled "Barbara Fritchie" was founded on fiction, but there have been enough facts told by eye witnesses to establish the reailty of the happening. Barbara lived with her sister and was surely a heroine of the highest order and in the broadest sense. She loved mankind because she first loved her country. Mrs. Bedgar (then Miss Bender) rode in a buggy wtih Stonewall Jackson, who bought some goods of Barbara Rice, an aunt of Mrs. Bedgar. Mrs. Bedgar's family belonged to the Rebel army. She saw John Brown fall off his horse, being wounded, opposite her father's home.

Stonewall Jackson placed under a guard the man who tore down Miss Fritchie's flag. His strong language on that occasion quoted from Whittier's poem that "who dares to touch a hair of her head dies like a dog," displayed the true southern chivalry that prevailed in those days.

REV. HICK'S PREDICTIONS

His Weather Forecast for the Month of August—Five Storm Periods.

Rev. Irl R. Hicks, of St. Louis, says in reference to the month of August, that the first half, if not more, of the month, will be very warm with a general and severe shortage of rainfall as we near the close of the month, copious and general rains will attend the great storms reasonably expected. Then in entering into detail he predicts five storm periods, as follows:

The first period will exten from the 4th to the 8th, having its center on the 6th. Storm conditions of which in the form of falling barometer, increasing humidity and warmth, with growing cloudiness will appear as early as the 4th. Storms and thunder gusts will quickly follow in Western sections, and duriug the 5th to about the 7th these disturbances will pass over the country in their eastward sweep. Rising barometer will succeed these storms, bringing change to cooler from the 7th to the 10th.

The second period is central on the 11th and 12th. The indications are for only moderate barometric and other changes at this time Threatening clouds with thunder gusts may show themselves over scattering localities, warm and dry. Unsettled and possibly threatening conditions will increase on and touching the 14th. On this date falls the full moon at an eclipse note which fact is almost sure to attract the disturbances of the periods immediately before and after the date. Either the reactionary disturbances due on the 11th and 12th will be delayed up to the 14th, or the disturbances of the regular period following will begin as early as the 14th.

The third period is central on the 17th, reaching normally from the 15th to 20th. It is quite probable that this period will open with barometer very low and storms will be forming in Western regions as early as the 14th and 15th. During the 16th to 19th very general and forcible storms will pass eastwardly across the country. Thunder and lightning will mark these storms with great emphasis. Earth quakes will be felt in various parts of the globe not far from the 14th. A decidedly high barometer and change to cooler will follow the western flank of those storms.

The fourth period will center on the 22nd, 23rd and 24th. Very high temperature, low barometer and vicious electrical storms will be very natural during the first stages of the period, but sudden change to high barometer and much cooler press the Western side of the storm area. There is a danger that these very sudden changes to cooler late in August will be followed by frosts in northern extremities.

The fifth period is central on the 29th covering the 27th to the 31st. As early as the 27th and 28th warnings of gathering storms will be noted in many parts of this and other countries. Equinoctual storms and hurricanes will almos certainly develop at this time an reach the Gulf and Atlantic Coas regions the last days of August The crisis of this period will no be over forty-eight hours from six o'clock p. m. on the 30th. The temperature will be excessively high over most sections and many storms of rain and thunder and hail, attended by violent tornadic gales, will pass over wide areas of the interior parts of the country. The storms of this period will continue into the opening days of September. A pronounced rise of the barometer will come from the northwest at the breaking of this period and bringing such extreme change to cooler as to give frosty nights in northern and central parts of the country.

THE POE AMENDMENT.

What It is And What People Says About It.

Below is the text of the essential part of the disfranchising Constitutional Amendment which will be submitted to the voters of Maryland at the next election. The part given is the test for voters, and, as the proposed amendment itself states, no person not coming under one of the three descriptions shall, if the amendment be adopted, be entitled to vote. Here is the test:

First. A person able to read any section of the Constitution of this State submitted to him by the officers of registration and to give a reasonable explanation of the same; or, if unable from physical disability to read such section, able to understand and give a reasonable explanation thereof when read to him by the registration officers; or,

Second. A person who on the first day of January, 1869, or prior thereto, was entitled to vote under the laws of this State or of any other State of the United States wherein he then resided; or,

Third. Any lineal male descendant of such last mentioned persons. No person not thus qualified by coming under some one of the above descriptions shall be registered as a qualified voter nor be entitled to vote.

What leading men say about the measure:

Mr. Charles J. Bonaparte, to the Republican State Central Committee: Of course I do not ask if you are opposed to it. Addressed to the Republicans, that question would be absurd and almost insulting. The Republican party has ever held, with Voltaire, that "a good citizen needs no grandfather."

Gov. Edwin Warfield: The educational requirement therein is not conservative or definite, but is vague and uncertain, and is liable to cause grave abuses through ...e prejudices, the whims of partisan zeal of the registration officers. Any educational requirement or qualification adopted should be defined in precise terms in the amendment and thus be placed beyond the power of any election officer to do justice by partisan or unfair action. The fundamental right of a citizen to exercise the privilege of suffrage should not depend upon the opinion of any set of election officers as to the reasonableness of his interpretation of any clause of the Censtitution.

Attorney General William Shepard Bryan, Jr.: It is a fundamental principal of Constitutional liberty, other than Magna Charta, that all man's rights should depend upon definite and ascertainable facts and not upon lhe discretion, opinion, whims, or caprices of any other man or set of men. And when the discretionary power to pass upon the political powers and privileges of any portion of the people is sought to be given to a set of men notorious and scandalously unfit to intelligently exercise that power, it is difficult to ... R...uss the measure in the language of moderation. The "leave to live by no man's leave" is the characteristic which distinguishes constitutional liberty from despotism.

Mr. Albert S. J. Owens, State's Attorney for Baltimore City: All law-abiding men agree it is wrong to steal—and right thinking men agree that it is at least just as wrong to steal votes as it is to steal money. Thus this amendment the organization having control of the ...rty machinery have the power ...the right to vote from as many ...qualified persons as they choose. Will any one contend that political leaders can bind the rank and ...e of the party to a scheme of ...itical larceny?

...ol. David G. McIntosh: In ... opinion it is vesting too much ...wer in the registration officers ...d is a very dangerous measure. ...m not sure, but I might be disqualified myself under this clause (the educational test), and it is not possible for the Judges of the Court of Appeals to be disqualified to vote, if the registration officers so mind.

Maj. John I. Yellott: If educated, intelligent and honest election officers familiar with the Constitution and capable of doing what many lawyers cannot do, viz., pass on a reasonable construction of any section of the Constitution, are to be appointed, then the amendment amounts to nothing. Such cannot be had and will not be appointed, but the tools of political bosses will fill the places, and the "reasonableness" of constitutional construction will depend wholly on the political sentiment of the proposed voter. This is wrong, vicious and dangerous.

Mr. Archibald H. Taylor: In fact, it is an utterly unprincipled measure, whose whole object and effect is to put an arbitrary power, to grant or refuse registration, in the hands of judges of election.

Mr. Alfred S. Niles: To my mind, a government based on the votes of an electorate so qualified is neither Republican, nor Democratic, nor Aristocratic, nor gov ernment at all in the true sense. It is anarchy under form of law.

Mr. John E. Semmes: I cannot understand how anyone who believes in honesty in business and in personal matters can ratify a dishonest act in a political way by voting for the Poe Amendment.

Mr. Leigh Bonsal. For my part, I fear much more the old Democratic Ring, with largely increased powers, than I do the bugboo of negro domination.

The Independent Citizen's Union (composed of individuals and sixty-one affiliated German-American societies): From the turbulent and bloody days of "Know-nothingism" to within but a few years ago, the political history of Maryland is replete with examples of violence, fraud and murder—all born of a desire to maintain political control despite the will of the people. The adoption of this amendment presages trouble in the future.

The Reform League: The Executive Committee reports to the League that the Poe Amendment is subversive of republican and democratic principles in our government; is unjust and insulting to white citizens of foreign birth or parentage no less than to colored men; furnishes no safeguard against the evils of an ignorant suffrage; entrusts arbitrary, excessive and dangerons powers to officers of registration, powers which can be and, according to all human probability, will be grossly abused by such officers for partisan purposes, as similar, though less extensive, powers have been abused in the past; threatens the most precious rights of our citizens and endangers self-government in Maryland.

As Mr. Bonaparte says, it is absurd to suppose that any Republican will vote for the amendment. With such good Democratic testimony against it why should any Democrat vote for it? With such eminent independent counsel, why should any independent vote for it? With the Independent Citizens' Union on record in such strong terms, why should any citizen of foreign birth or descent vote for it? After the Reform League's report, why should any reformer vote for it. WHY SHOULD ANY ONE VOTE FOR IT?

CALIFORNIA

Do you want to live where the climate is mild the year round—where labor is never oppressed by stress of weather, and where animal vitality is never lost by mere conflict with cold?

Do you want to live in a region where the resources are more varied than in any other equal area in the world, where the division of great ranches affords a fine opportunity to get a small farm that will assure you a competence?

Do you want to live where, with a minimum of labor, you can grow profitable crops of grapes and small fruit, oranges, lemons, olives, prunes and almonds, alfalfa and grain, where crops are sure, business is good and capital easily finds profitable investment?

Then go to California, where both health and opportunity await your coming.

The Chicago, Union Pacific and North-Western Line is the most direct route to the Pacific Coast, and there are two fast through trains daily via this line, over the famous double-track railway between Chicago and the Missouri River.

Special low round-trip rates are in effect via this line throughout the summer to various Pacific Coast points, and colonist low rate one-way tickets will be on sale during September and October, which give an unusual chance for settlers to make the trip at a minimum of expense.

Daily and personally conducted excursions are operated through to San Francisco, Los Angeles, and Portland without change, on which a double berth in a Pullman tourist sleeping car from Chicago costs only $7.00, via the

The Spirit of Reform.

I'M goin' to be a better boy
  Than I have ever been before.
I'm goin' to be a greater joy
  To ma an' love her more an' more.
I'm goin' to work an' never rest
  No matter how I want to play.
I'm going to do my very best—
  Till after circus anyway.

When pa asts me if I won't run
  An errand for him, even w'en
Th' game were playin' ain't quite done,
  I'll start off just as quick, an' then
He'll be su'prised t' think I don't Say, "After 'w'ile." An' I won't say,
"I'd ruther not,' or, "Can't," or,
    "Won't"—
  Till after circus anyway.

No matter if the work is hard,
  I'll never make a fuss at all.
I'll pile the wood an' rake th' yard
  No matter if they're playin' ball,
An' w'en they call me in at night
  I won't stand out in front an' say,
"Oh, just a minute more!" 'Tain't right—
  Till after circus anyway.

No matter if there's lots o' pie,
  I won't ast for anuther piece.
I'll fold my napkin up w'en I Get done an' say, "Excuse me, please."
I'll try to keep as nice an' clean
  As a boy ought to be an' pray
Not ever to be cross an' mean—
  Till after circus anyway.

An' then w'en it comes circus day
  I'll just p'tend that I forget,
An' w'en ma looks at me I'll say,
  "I didn't know it's comin' yet!"
An' then she'll sort o' smile at me,
  But I'll just work an' never say
A word, cuz that's th' way to be—
  Till after circus anyway.

Then maybe she'll tell pa how I
  Just worked an' how I never knew
Th' big parade was comin' by
  At ten o'clock an' how at two
Th' big show opens, an' then he
  Will take a dollar out an' say
I'm 'bout as good as boys can be—
  Till after circus anyway.

NEW OFFICERS FOR COMMUNITY

Annual Meeting Held Tuesday When Election Took Place.

Tuesday of this week the annual meeting of the Community of Mountain Lake Park was held at which officers were elected for the ensuing year and other business of importance to the general public of the Park transacted.

The election was participated in by all property owners of the Park and was conducted at Assembly Hall, resulting in the election of the following:

President, Major J. M. Burns; secretary, Rev. L. A. Rudisill; treasurer, Mr. E. E. Friend; street commissioner, Mr. Hanson B. Lewis; members of the Annual Committee, Messrs. Upton Cuppett and George M. Jacobs, the latter a resident of Fairmont but a large property holder at the Park.

Various matters appertaining to the future welfare of the Community were discussed and plans formulated for the improved condition of internal affairs at the Park adopted.

FROM PRESIDENT TO CONGRESS

One Chief Magistrate Held Office for Sixty Years.

Which of the 25 Presidents of the United States filled the most offices, and served longest in public life? Investigation shows he was John Quincy Adams. It can be said he lived aud died in office. He certainly died in that relation in 1848, while member of the House of Representatives, and in the very hall where he had served continuously eight terms, 16 years, beginning four years after his Presidential term had expired in 1829. The more early Presidents seemed not to think of accepting office after their Presidential terms had expired, but Quincy Adams changed the custom.

It would be difficult to list all the different offices or places he filled in his long life, beginning in his boyhood, when his father, John Adams was so much and often abroad, as Minister to about half of the National Courts of Europe, including England. J. Q. Adams was one of the four American statesmen who negotiated the treaty of Ghent with England on the day before Christmas, two weeks before the battle of New Orleans January 8, 1815. Had the ocean cable then existed, there would have been no celebration of the eighth of January. And where would the immortal Jackson have stood in history. J. Q. Adams in early life, was a State Senator in Massachusetts, then a Congressman, later a United States Senator. Secretary of State for the whole of President Monroe's two terms, elected President by the House of Representatives in 1824, the only election of the kind in our history. A candidate for re-election 1828, and defeated by Gen. Jackson. But the strange part of his life was to be a candidate so often for Congress, after he had filled the Presidential chair. He must have had a taste and even a wish for office. As a Congressman, he was active, useful and aggressive even in his aged years, the last of which he called a "nosthumous life." His official career lasted over 60 years with but few intervals.

Jackson was once a judge, then a congressman, while that body sat in Philadelphia, and in the early twenties, a U. S. Senator a few years. Andrew Johnson, one of the accidental Presidents, filled a number of offices before the Presidential chair fell to him so sadly. Some years later he became a Senator from Tennessee, died in 1875, while a member. John Tyler, another of the accidental presidents, it was humorously said, accepted a road supervisorship of three years and eleven months. J. B.

VOLUME 29. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, AUGUST 17, 1905. NUMBER 24.

OAKLAND BAND REORGANIZED.

Oakland's Former Musical Organization Again Brought to Life.

A few years ago the Oakland Band was among the best and strongest musical organizations in the State but by force of circumstances and the removal from town of a number of the members, the band was allowed to run down and finally disintegrate.

This summer the citizens and visitors to town have interested themselves in the reorganization of the band culminating recently in the assembling of many of the members of the former band at Gortner's Hall when new life was imparted and a new band organized with the following members:

Walter Morrison, Will Lawton, cornets; Charles Liller, Carl White, trombones; Dennis Rasche, baritone; John Weber, Roy Cropp, Arthur Lawton, altos; Thomas Gonder, clarinet; H. A. Rasche, tuba; John Sweeney, bass drum; Leslie King, tenor drum.

The band starts out with twelve members which can readily be increased to twice the number if the proper encouragement is extended the members by the citizens of town

BITTINGER.

The trustees of our public school have secured the services of Mr. Conrad Hamp, of Keyser Ridge, who will have charge of our school for the approaching school year.

Work will be begun this week on the new "Amish Road" running from this village to the Amish settlement west of here. When completed this road will be a convenience to the traveling public.

Mrs. Jonas Bittinger, who was ailing for the past few days, is about again.

Mrs. T. B. Wiley wears the championship belt as snake slayer, as she is reported to have killed six rattlers one day last week.

Mr. and Mrs. Loechel, of Grantsville, were calling on Mrs. Hettie Doolittle last Saturday and Sunday.

Jas. Emerick and family, of Meyersdale Pa., were guests at The Central Saturday night.

C. E. Ellithorp has greatly enhanced the appearance of his farm by having his barn painted.

C. H. Jennings, of Jennings, Md., rode through here last week on a very fine horse recently brought from Kentucky. It is said that the price paid for the animal was $1200.

The good people of this place are arranging to hold their annual "Harvest Home" celebration on Sept. 6th. Details will be given later.

LOTS AT PUBLIC AUCTION.

Seventy-five Choice Building Sites at Public Sale Tomorrow.

Messrs A. D. Naylor and D. E. Bolden, who own a tract of land located at the head of Second street and comprising about seventy-five building lots, will sell the property at public auction tomorrow, the sale to begin at eleven o'clock in the morning.

The lots are delightfully situated, the original titles being vested in Mrs. Walker and the late Mrs. General George A. Crook. The land has been platted out and the lots staked off so that there will be but little difficulty in purchasers and intending purchasing locating any of them. Second street will be extended through the land and a cross street to connect with Hooppole Road will be located.

The lots vary in size, some of them being over one hundred feet front. Terms of the sale are very reasonable. See large advertisement in this paper today.

An Address to the Sabbath School Workers of Garrett County.

At the convention of the Sunday School Union of Maryland held at Deer Park on the 16th, 17th and 18th of June last, the convention thought best to elect me president of the Sunday School Union of Garrett county. Inasmuch as this unsought honor has been conferred upon me, I shall do my best not to disappoint the Sunday school brethrem who elected me, in being as useful to them and their cause as they could desire and that we in co-operation together in labor and unity may stimulate the whole county in a forward movement in the very important work before us, which is second to no work of the Christian church, national, social, or individual.

It is my purpose to visit so far as I can, all superintendents of Sunday schools in the county, so that we may know each other better, and arrange for a forward and progressive development of the great cause that we represent. Brethren we have been chosen by God himself through human agency, I trust, to work and wield an influence in a sphere of operation, in which we must do our best, and thus glorify God, that we may receive the benefit by receiving God's blessing and the appreciation of men. Work, pray and devise means by which we can raise the Sunday school interest and standard to greater usefulness.

Yours in the Work,
W. H. CLARY.

The Value of Woman as a Government Asset

By Rev. ANNA H. SHAW, President National Woman Suffrage Association

We have heard much of Dr. Osler and his theory that the value of a man's life ceases at the age where woman's begins. But we have heard little of an equally startling and important statement made by him at the Canadian club in which he warns our neighbors across the border against the emigration of so many young women to the United States, and he suggests two remedies, one of which is of peculiar interest to women, showing, as it does, the INTRINSIC value of woman AS A CITIZEN. Dr. Osler recommends "an exportation tax of $100 to be paid to the Canadian government by every young woman who emigrates to the United States or that the government pay $1,000 to the family to keep her at home." She of course is to have no voice in the disposition of her life—the money is not to be paid TO HER. She is not to be a free human being, to go where she may make her lot easier, to choose her life's vocation, but her parents are to be paid to restrain her freedom as if she were a mere chattel to be kept in the country for the sole purpose of race propagation for the benefit of the nation. The important thing about this statement to us is that it shows that in dealing with women there is no respect for their individuality and NO RECOGNITION OF THEIR PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY or even of their separate existence as human entities. But it gives us hope, for it sets a value upon the service women may perform for the state, although they are not to receive the reward for the service. It is a point gained, however, for political economists to admit that motherhood is a service to the state and that the government is indebted to the citizen who rears children. In time they may see that it is just that the one who performs the service SHALL RECEIVE THE COMPENSATION and that the duty and obligation of motherhood must carry with them the power to protect themselves in the high vocation of home making and child rearing. They will learn that whatver promotes the integrity and nobility of the individual citizen ministers DIRECTLY TO THE WELFARE OF THE NATION, and that is why a nation is most indebted to its mothers.

Since motherhood is a direct service to the state without which no state can exist, mothers should have the ballot to protect themselves and their children.

NO CLASS OF CITIZENS ENGAGED IN ANY INDUSTRY CAN BE TRUSTED TO PROTECT THE INTEREST OF ANY OTHER CLASS ENGAGED IN ANY OTHER LINE OF INDUSTRY, AND THAT IS WHY MEN CANNOT REPRESENT MOTHERS IN GOVERNMENT.

In Memoriam.

RAVENSCROFT—In loving, but sad remembrance, of our dear son, Dr. T. H. Ravenscroft, who departed this life four years ago, Aug. 12, 1901:

In memory we ofttimes see thee,
The one we love so dear;
The visions grow so clear sometimes
We feel he must be near.

But no—four years ago today,
When all the world was bright,
Our dear Frank was called away
Out of our mortal sight.

LUNA WAS SHY.

Eclipse Was Not Seen by Many People Monday Night.

The shyness of Luna at being out alone after night joined with the thick banks of clouds which covered the sky prevented much of the eclipse of Monday night from being seen. About 11 o'clock the clouds parted for a few moments and those who happened to be abroad at that hour saw the moon with part of its face obscured. Reports from many places state that scientists had little opportunity to observe the eclipse, but they had expected to learn little or nothing new on account of the occurrence.

Tasker's New Newspaper.

Mr. Hiram P. Tasker, formerly of Oakland, where he was known as editor of the Garrett County Herald some thirty years ago, has again entered the newspaper field as editor of the Tri-State Herald, published at Cumberland. The paper is independent in politics and in his salutatory Mr. Tasker states in language not to be mistaken his stand on local matters, adding this unique foreword: "We imagine we can foresee and forehear the remarks of some of our cynical and pessimistic enemies will make about us. Instead of sending us a dollar to help the good cause along, they will say, 'Just wait 'till Tasker gets drunk, as he sometimes did when publishing the Garrett County Herald thirty years ago.' 'Man's inhumanity to man makes countless millions mourn.' But we promised the public not to do so any more. A burnt child dreads the fire. We have learned that too much whiskey is very bad stuff, and cut it out. We are not a prohibitionist and don't believe in sumptuary laws of any kind. When we feel like taking a glass of beer we walk up to Jake Gottlieb's and take it and are not ashamed to say so. Nobody has seen us under the influence of whiskey during the last two years. We can prove the assertion, but it is not necessary. Our word is sufficient, as we have honesty and truth stamped on our brow, metaphorically speaking."

TESTIMONIAL FOR THE MARYLAND

An Appeal for Funds to Supply a Service for the Big Cruiser.

With possibla few exceptions there has not been a more patriotic movement started in Maryland within recent years, than the one which is now being presented to the residents of the State by the Maryland Cruiser Fund Commission, which is raising a fund with which to purchase a suitable testimonial to be presented to the armored cruiser which bears the proud name of this state.

Thousands of letters, appealing for contributions to the fund are being sent out throught the counties, and this county has not been forgotten. Several of the banks, have been named as depositories by Governor Warfield and Mayor Timanus of Baltimore City for any funds which might be contributed in this section. It might also be stated that the office of this paper is open at any time to receive contributions, no matter how small the amount, for this worthy and patriotic cause.

Nearly $2,000 has been raised to date, and it is the desire of the Commission to swell the amount to at least $5,000. Every resident in this county should contribute to the fund. Even the public school children ought to feel sufficient interest in the cause, to contribute even a 5-cent piece. Other states have presented their namesakes in the Navy with handsome gifts. Why should not Maryland do the same?

The appeal which is being sent out by the Commission follows:

MARYLAND CRUISER FUND COMMISSION.

BALTIMORE, August 11, 1905.

Republican, Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir:—On July 13, His Excellency, Governor Warfield, and His Honor, Mayor Timanus of Baltimore City, named a Commission to have prepared a proper testimonial to the Armored Cruiser that bears the proud name of our State. This custom has prevailed not only all over this country, but has been handed down from the World through centuries, and we citizens must not stand back, and be the first to break such a happy and fitting custom expression from the people of our State.

We appeal to you to contribute to this fund, and lend us the aid of a small part of your time, by presenting this question to those of your associates that it would be impossible for us to reach. Do not let the cruiser Maryland sail one day longer, without carrying with her the symbols of good-fellowship given by the people whose blood should run quicker whenever the name of their native and dearly loved State is mentioned. Let us all join in doing the right thing by our namesake, so that when the good old State song, "Maryland, My Maryland" is sung on her decks, every man in her may be proud of the name she bears.

We appeal to you to help us make this movement as successful as such worthy cause reserves. Kindly forward any subscriptions to Col. William A. Boykin, treasurer, 1326 Greenmount Avenue, Baltimore, or to the depository nearest to you that has been named by Governor Warfield and Mayor Timanus.

Very truly yours,
E. STANLEY GRAY,
Chairman.

THE TOWN TO GRANTSVILLE

As Seen by a Meyersdale Newspaper Man.

Among the villages within a circuit of a dozen of miles of Meyersdale, Grantsville, Md., is one that not only holds its own but also keeps steadily improving. A visit made to this place lately by a representative of the Commercial, who had not visited the place during the last two years, a period during which the place has shown every sign of substantial improvement. A number of new buildings have been erected, while others are now in course of construction.

The first mention we find of this place is in Searight's history of the "Old Pike," which chronicles that in 1833 Samuel Gilks kept a tavern in the east end of Grantsville.

Among the improvements made the last year is a fine brick residence built by C. A. Younkin located near the upper part of the town. This building has a substantial stone basement and cellar 7 feet high in which are located the coal bins, vegetable cellars and also a place to install heating apparatus, etc. The main portion of the building is of brick and surrounded with both back and front porches. There are eight rooms finished in oak besides bath room and closet.

Richard Younkin, a brother of Mr. C. H. Younkin also built a fine residence during the last year, this residence is also a fine one and is finished in the best style; C. A. Bender has also made many improvements in the National Hotel, which he recently purchased. He contemplates making other improvements in this justly popular hostelry in the near future including bath room.

Audrew Beyans is breaking ground to build a new hotel, one of the largest in this section.

This place has always been noted for its fine general stores. The general and department store of Bender & Hershberger is one of the finest and best stocked with all kinds of seasonable goods to be found outside the largest towns. This establishment which is a large one is filled in every department and the goods are of the finest quality and most varied assorments. Both the partners, Mr. C. D. Hershberger and Mr. Bender have been brought up in business and show every courtesy to their patrons.

The town also can boast of a most prosperous National Bank with a list of directors having among them some of the most substantial capitalists in Allegany and Garrett counties. Among these might be mentioned C. H. Jennings, of Jennings, Md.; U. M. Stanton, Garrett county; G. C. Keller, Grantsville; Frank Watts and W. A. Hitchins, Frostburg; Eli Stanton and J. S. Hershberger, Garrett county, with J. O. Getty, of Grantsville, cashier. This institution has a capital stock of $25,000 and a surplus of $8,500.

A visit to Grantsville would not be complete without a visit to the Gnagey farm adjoining town, where Samuel Hershberger has a fine herd of registered Jersey cows, the finest that can be found. Besides these cows he has several younger cattle and a fine bull registered of the best pedigree that can be found. Mr. Hershberger makes a specialty of raising pure bred Jerseys and buying only from the best dealers and knowing the wants of the owners of stock and the kind required for the section he has been very successful in the business.

J. S. Hershberger at the stone house who makes a specialty of fine draft horses, has a fine stock of these animals that command the highest prices. He recently sold a pair of matched horses at Windber for $550 and a single horse for $285. He has now about 19 horses on the farm. This place has its full quota of summer boarders during the heated term, Hotel Casselman having been full the whole season.

Uriah Stanton has shut down his saw mill but will resume again about August 25th.—Meyersdale Commercial.

Lectured to 4,000 People.

The "Man of Gallilee," an illustrated lecture, by Rev. A. H. Zimmerman, formerly pastor of Kingsley Methodist Episcopal church, Cumberland, drew an audience of over four thousand people at Mountain Lake Park on Sunday last, and the lecture was listened to with much attention on the part of this large audience. This was the largest gathering attending at Mountain Lake Park this year. On Saturday last Rev. Zimmerman delivered an illustrated lecture at the same place on "Our Country, Its Crown and Glory."

It is now beginning to be suspected that one Joe Miller originally wrote the Poe amendment, and that its authorship was concealed for fear the public might think it was a joke.

REAL INTENT LAID BARE.

Under the keen analysis of such fearless and outspoken Democrats as Edgar H. Gans and Archibald H. Taylor the true meaning of the Poe amendment is being laid bare. It must give the organization managers a jar to read this declaration from Mr. Gans:

I oppose the amendment because it is a fraudulent attempt to undermine the Constitution of the United States.

That the program involves discrimination against the negro in the administration of the amendment is openly avowed by everybody identified with the birth and nurture of the iniquitous thing, from Murray Vandiver and Senator Gorman down. The very cry of "white supremacy" excludes the idea that the negro will be given a fair show in the constitutional examination. No concealment is made of the intention to violate the Fifteenth Amendment, which forbids discrimination on account of "race, or color or previous condition of servitude." The registrars of voters would in this despicable business be expected to commit perjury and violate the oath which our State Constitution enjoins upon them, wherein they pledge themselves to execute their offices "without partiality or prejudice."

Mr. Taylor reminds the reputed sponsor of this amendment (Mr. Poe) that he has sworn, "probably a thousand times," to obey the Constitution of the United States. Every lawyer, every man holding public office or who has held public office since 1870, every naturalized citizen has bound himself in honor by solemn oath of fealty to obey the Consitution of his country. Anyone of these, acting as registrars, or conniving at or assisting in the administration of the Poe measure in the manner designated by the Democratic ring, would be guilty of perjury, and every citizen not under the same direct pledge would be morally guilty of a wrongful act.

Presented in this light, it is clear that those who vote for this measure are sowing seeds of anarchy, for anarchy is the wanton disregard of law.

New Money-order Form.

Washington, August 9.—Before leaving for his vacation Postmaster General Cortelyou directed the issuance of a new form of money order, which, it is believed, will be proof against alteration at the hands of forgers. The department has been greatly annoyed by the operations of persons who purchase money orders for small amounts and raise them, passing them upon merchants after office hours. Although the direct loss falls entirely upon those who accept the orders, the department refusing to cash them except as originally drawn, there has been a heavy indirect expense involved in the pursuit, arrest and conviction of the offenders.

Gorman to Retire.

New York, Aug. 8.—A prominent citizen of Maryland and a life long friend of Arthur P. Gorman, now stopping at the Holland House here, is authority for the statement that Senator Gorman at the expiration of his present term will retire permanently from office and active politics.

The Senator has been in public life 46 years. Of late years his health has been poor and he has has been advised to give up affairs and devote his remaining years to rest.

This generalization of the plans of the senior Senator from Maryland was given in good faith to the correspondent, contingent on the withholding of the source.

Jehoiakim Burns The Word Of God.

Jehoiakim is a type of the sinful soul asserting itself in terror and wrath against the righteous judgments of God. His fate was terrible example of the folly of doing so. A merciful Providence had given every opportunity of repentence. God had allowed him to be dethroned, put in irons, his face set toward Babylon. The came an unexpected reversal of fortune—liberation and re-enthronement. God's hand ought to have been recognized, but was not. Neither severity nor goodness affected his obdurate heart.

In the present instance the threatening prophecies, so lately and publicly read, could not long, in the nature of things, be secreted from the king. But his courtiers approached him with consummate skill. They left the scroll behind, lest the very sight of it should inflame him. They secreted the prophet and his amanuensis, lest the king in his rage should kill them. They attempted to break the "burden" of the prophet in the softest manner possible, in hopes that his stubborn will would yield and disaster be averted.

The king was seated in the winter residence portion of the palace, which was itself the target for the prophet's shaft—a house with spacious apartments and airy balconies, ceiled with cedar, painted with vermilion, but built with enforced and unrequited labor.

The strategy of the nobles availed nothing in this instance. The king was in a passion at once. He demanded to see the scroll. When three or four columns were read he could endure no more. In spite of the entreaties which his princes had the courage to make, with the deliberation of an implacable malice he prepared to destroy the parchment. Taking a scribe's knife, sharp for mending pens and making erasures, he began cutting the odious document into shreds, and kept dropping it, piece by piece, into the brazier of live coals and waiting till each had shriveled up before he dropped another, until the whole was consumed. He would have dealt in the manner with Jeremiah and Baruch if he could have laid hands upon them. But how secure are they whom the Lord hides!

Doubtless the king congratulated himself upon the total destruction of the hateful writings. How brief the respite. The scroll was a phenix. It rose from its own ashes. Not a syllable was wanting. And there were terrible additions, to the effect that the land should be entirely desolate, that no descendant of the king should permanently sit upon his throne, and that his corpse should meet a fate peculiarly revolting to the Oriental mind.

Analysis and Key.

I. Jehoiakim a Type.

1. Self assertion against God.
2. His warning: its failure.
3. Defiant destruction of the Scripture.
4. Its importance. Scroll a phenix.

The Teacher's Lantern.

This celebrated scene is so dramatic that the temptation is strong to use it in a rhetorical way. For example, at first blush it seems to fit in a singularly clever manner the so called higher critic. He is apparently engaged in cutting the Bible to pieces. And to all intents aud purposes his work is as futile as that of Jehoiakim's pen-knife.

* * * * *

On the other hand, to disallow the correct and reverent application of the working principles of literary criticism to the Scriptures is to put them in the category with the golden plates of the Mormon Bible.

The verified and assured conclusions of scientific criticism must be received or the Church and individual falls out hopelessly in the march of the world's life.

* * * * *

The critic's pen knife may be doing the work of the surgeon's scalpel. It may be ridding the body of Scripture from foreign and alien matter. It may bring into proper position parts which have been misplaced.

* * * * *

The Bible can not only endure, it can challenge criticism. No true friend of the sacred book should seek to exempt it from the test of literary criticism. When all is said and done it is highly probable that for substance of doctrine and precept we shall have the same old book our father's had.

* * * * *

The knife and fire were so very handy. Sight of them suggested the means of destruction. The angry king snatched the knife from the scribe's girdle. And there stood the brazier of red hot coals. The implements of vice are rightly banished by law. Men act largely by suggestion. Out of sight is to be out of mind for most. The saying that opportunity makes thieves is not strictly true; but all will agree that it is well to have the opportunities reduced to a minimum.

* * * * *

Jehoiakim was practically sold out to heathenism when he came to his throne. He was Pharaoh's pumpet, and to please his master added Egyptian rites to others which he adopted.

* * * * *

"Another roll." Truth gained emphasis by reiteration. Spite of knife and fire the word of God remains and is indestructible.

* * * * *

Baruch deserves to have his name perpetuated. He knew the peril of being scribe to Jeremiah. At first he demurred, but when he once accepted the office he gave a splendid example of constancy and courageously read the prophet's message in the court of the temple.

* * * * *

Sad days were these. The times ware evil. Josiah's death is declared to have been the most tragic event in Hebrew history. And the complete destruction of the land by the king of Babylon was now impending.

* * * * *

There is a due significance in the juxtaposition of this lesson and the preceding. The former shows the Bible honored. This the Bible dishonored. To Josiah the Bible was a savor of life. To Jehoiakim of death. In no mystical way, but none the less efficiently, the Bible slays or makes alive as men use it to-day.

The Greater Gain

By FRANK LILLIE POLLOCK

Copyright, 1904, by Frank Lillie Pollock

THE fortnight following his wife's death passed very slowly to Walter Lindsay, professor of English literature and language at the college of Rameses City. He did no lecturing—indeed, he was about to resign his chair—and he dragged out the twenty-one empty days in the falsest of false positions. He had to receive the condolences of his friends and pretend that the woman's death meant something besides emancipation. He was ashamed to catch himself even thinking of it as such. He rejoiced, but in mental stealth, and in the midst of these emotions he was surprised by the strong and sharp sense of physical bereavement—the sudden removal of what had so long been a part of life to be endured.

His literary ambitions had never deserted him, though for the last decade he had had little time and less heart for actual work. But he had always tried to keep the flame alight. He remembered the time when his friends had thought the highest prizes not beyond his reach. He was only forty-one even now—a man's best age. Under the stimulus of anticipation he got out his old manuscripts and tried to start something new, but he could settle his mind to no sustained effort. He postponed beginning work till he should be well settled in New York, and he telegraphed his friend Russell to meet him at the ferry on Thursday.

"Why, he's an old man!" was Russell's first horrified mental exclamation as he caught sight of the lean, stooping figure in the black coat and baggy trousers, the rather sunken eyes and the wisps of faded hair on the temples. He had seen his old classmate only once since Lindsay had gone to Indiana, and his memory had always been of the brilliant youth whose insatiable intellectual curiosity and range of thought had seemed to mark him infallibly for distinction.

"I feel certain that I can do better work here than I have ever done. There is something stimulating, exciting, about a great city. Don't you find it so?" said Lindsay.

"I might—if one didn't have to keep up with the race," said Russell dryly. "Have you brought any manuscripts with you?"

"A few, mostly old ones. You know I have not had much time for writing during the last few years. Of course," he went on, hesitating a little, "you know how it has been, and I may say that I do not feel that I have lost anything by it, and I would do it all over again under the same circumstances. There may have been some loss of time, but I feel sure there has been a greater gain. It's been good for me; I'm full of ideas, and a man needs mellowing a little before he can do his best work. Don't you think so? But how have you been getting on? You never wrote me much about yourself."

"Oh, fairly enough in my small way," he said, fumbling for his latchkey. "'As thy strength so shall thy day be here.' Here, you know, I've lost a good many illusions about my own genius, and I've come to have more respect for a potboiler than I once had. I never would have believed it once, but I really don't suppose I ever had it in me to write a 'Hamlet.' You were always the man with the sacred fire. Come along—this way."

The tall building consisted mostly of studios, and Russell occupied a much windowed room at the bitter end of a narrow staircase of many flights. Books and sheets of manuscripts were shuffled about everywhere; there were tropical posters on the walls, mixed with scraps of sketches and photographs, and a diffused suggestion of tobacco made a warm, hospitable odor of habitation. The haphazard disorder jarred on Lindsay's habits of precision, but it spoke unmistakably of work, and he respected it for that. Only he said as he washed off the coal dust of the train, "I suppose this is Bohemia."

Russell looked at the end of the cigarette he had mechanically lighted as if it disagreed with him.

"Oh, yes, this is Bohemia," he answered. "But Bohemia, to be any good, has got to be within you, like the kingdom of heaven. And it's a young man's country, Lindsay. We've got no business in it. To a man of forty Bohemia simply means poverty. If he hasn't gone over to Philistia by that age it's because he's made a financial failure. I began this way because I liked it, and now I can't get away."

Lindsay established himself in a smaller room on the same floor of the house, where he could have the benefit of his friend's counsel and the use of his typewriter, and he spent the rest of the afternoon in unpacking and settling himself. Russell was writing hard and made no appearance till evening, when he came in to take Lindsay out to dinner.

"We'll go to Zinfandel's place," he said. "It's cheap; it's got as much Bohemian color as anywhere, and you'll probably see some men there whom it will be useful to know."

The big basement restaurant was full of men when they arrived, the cigarette smoke was already curling up, and there was a rattle of dishes and conversation.

"Ah, there's McGann!" exclaimed Russell, gesticulating to a late comer, who nodded over the intervening heads and made his way to a seat at their table. Lindsay had heard of him as the editor of the Gray Leaf, the apostle of symbolism in unsymbolic New York.

Lindsay felt a little shy about joining in the conversation that followed, most of which was upon men and local literary matters beyond his knowledge. Anxious to say something, he caught at the first name he recognized.

"Isn't that the man who has just come out with a new version of Omar, in hendecasyllabics or something?"

"Ah, yes," said Russell. "'The wild ass stamps o'er his head, but cannot break his sleep.' But he can do bully translation sometimes. Did you see his version of 'La Citta Morta?'"

"D'Annunzio's, isn't it? No. I don't read D'Annunzio. I am unable to see why moral and physical perversion and disease should pose as literature, even"—

"S-sh!" interrupted Russell. "You must not say those things to McGann. He won't let you contribute to his magazine."

"It's the old question—art and ethics," McGann observed wearily.

But that was no merely abstract question to Lindsay. He had thought upon it to exhaustion. The justification of his whole conduct of life hung upon its answer, and he entered upon a statement of the necessary and essential morality of art and, as a corollary, of the artist. It was not particularly original, and it was colored with the peculiar crudity of the man who believed in all his convictions.

Nobody seemed inclined to pursue the subject any further when he stopped, but Lindsay, flushed with his discourse, joined largely in the succeeding talk, attempted epigrams and tried to show that he was not the raw outsider he might appear.

Lindsay could not sleep for hours after he went to bed. Physical fatigue, the novelty of his late experiences, the consciousness that he was entering at last upon the real struggle of his life, excited his overtaxed nerves, and there was a depressing undercurrent of alarm at the complexity and speed of the strange currents upon which he had cast himself.

Russell had advised him to loaf about for a few days till he should begin to feel at home, and next day he loafed assiduously—up and down Broadway from Madison square to the Battery, along the water front and in that amazing whirlpool that swirls daily round the placid tower of Trinity church. He was not much refreshed thereby. The turmoil of conflicting energies stunned his nervous system and hammered into his soul the sense of the terrific speed of the race for existence here where the race was to the strong. The idea of failure overtook him with a species of terror. He seemed to see himself falling beneath an avalanche of he knew not what filthy and abominable but all but irresistible forces. He had not made much progress toward feeling at home, but he began to experience a restless desire to be at work without further waste of the precious time.

He declined to go to Zinfandel's that night. So Russell went alone, and, meeting McGann at the door, they went in together.

"Where's your friend?" inquired the editor. "I like a man with convictions. Does not his presence make you feel like the idlest of decorative objects—a mere flower, a little violet?"

"I'll tell you what it does do, McGann—it makes me mad!" ejaculated Russell, sitting up and forgetting his soup. "You and Lindsay are my oldest friends, I suppose, and I wouldn't tell this to any one else, but, by Jove, it's worth telling. He and I were in the same class at Yale, and everybody thought there was no end to his genius. Oh, I know what a college reputation is! But I tell you he turned out a story or two and some poems that the best man living mightn't have been ashamed to sign. He had things in the best magazines, and his style had just that brightness that always makes a hit. We had always cherished the plan of settling down here or in Boston and writing for all we were worth, but he got married a year after he graduated, and I had to do it alone. I knew his wife before he did. She was a pretty little blond thing, genteel, private school, personally conducted to Europe and so on. She read up all the latest books to talk about them and thought she would like to have a salon. Why she married him heaven only knows. I believe she was speculating on his future. They hadn't any money, and of course he couldn't risk any such a game of chance as literature when he had a wife to look after—she wasn't the woman to back him up in a fight—so he got a sort of professorship in a wretched little school in Rameses."

"Rameses, Indiana? Good God!" interrrupted the decadent.

"He was going to hold it for only two or three years and then come back east, but he's been there ever since—for seventeen years. He never had time to push ahead with his writing, and then his wife's lungs gave out, and for the last several years she has been progressing along in consumption. She went all to pieces, the way her sex always do when anything gets wrong, and I fancy she must have got pretty difficult, to say the least. His wife died last month, and here he is. You've seen him. McGann, there's a man who started out with better brains and more of them than you or I ever will have, and now he's—well, he's a cheap schoolmaster. He's made a sacrifice of himself, and the fire doesn't seem to descend on the altar. There's an immoral tale for your Gray Leaf."

"HELLO, OLD MAN! WHAT HAVE YOU BEEN DOING?"

"Does he understand it yet?" asked McGann curiously.

"Probably not, but he'll have to soon enough. He's old; he's used up; he's killed himself for a fool of a woman that he didn't care two sous for."

Certainly Lindsay had no idea that he was used up. Next morning he sat down before a thick pile of foolscap and opened a new bottle of ink. He had a brain full of ideas that had been accumulating for years, and he set to work upon a story of the middle west, his own country, that he had long been revolving. It came hard; the ideas refused to run freely into words, and he was forced to build up his tale in a laborious brickwork of slow sentences.

So, thus launched, Lindsay fought his fight. It was hard and bitter, for on one side stood the horror of failure, of financial failure, in New York, and this to a man unaccustomed to risk is totally destructive of mental poise, and on the other side iron habit held him down in a groove of orthodoxy.

The rejected manuscripts began to come back in about five days, and for three weeks Lindsay listened for the postman's whistle as for the trump of doom. As the manuscripts came he reread them in cold blood, and the result was sickening. He quite agreed with the editorial decisions. He said that he wouldn't print such stuff in a magazine of his own. But he knew that he could do better; he knew that he had ideas that were novel and striking, and he plunged desperately into work again, ready to have dissected his own heart if it could have taught him the lost secrets of his craft.

Five days later Russell came into his friend's room and saw the wastebasket standing in the middle of the floor, crammed with torn paper to the brim. Lindsay was sealing an envelope.

"Hello, old man! What have you been doing?" he cried.

Lindsay turned up a colorless face.

"Why," he began vaguely, but with an attempt at dignified cheerfulness, "I—the fact is, I'm going back."

"Going back?"

"Yes, to Rameses. My successor hasn't been definitely appointed yet, I learn, and I can have my old place back at—ah—a slightly reduced salary. It's no use, Russell; you must have seen it. I can't work at high pressure any more. If I ever could have done anything, it's too late now. I suppose I can do my college work. Don't fancy, though, that I'm going back from a mistake to the real work of my life. I never liked teaching, and I never was any good. They'll take me back because I was there so long, but there won't be processions or bonfires on the campus at my return. But it's the only thing that I can do. I—you see, I had always built my best hopes on something else."

He looked at Russell, and there was absolutely nothing to be said.

Russell went to the depot next evening and saw him off. It seemed to be an older, more stooped, more gray haired figure than had come. He could have wept or cursed from sheer rage and pity.

"Poor devil!" he muttered bitterly as he was being carried back up Forty-second street. "He has lost the world and gained his own soul, or is it the other way—or has he lost both?"

The car stopped, and Russell got off. Broadway, strong, triumphant, thundered and flared before him. It was the visible expression of the typical New York mood; unconsciously its presence colored Russell's thoughts.

"There must always have been a weakness in him," he said to himself, awaiting his car. "It led him to his marriage; it posed as stern morality all his life; it made him throw up the sponge here. Did we always overestimate him? Did he ever really have the strength to reach success? I wonder."

WE WERE BOYS TOGETHER

By George P. Morris

GEORGE P. MORRIS, poet and journalist, was born in Philadelphia Oct. 10, 1802, and died in New York July 6, 1864. Some of his lyrics and songs are lovingly remembered by older folk and are still sung. The most popular of his poems is "Woodman, Spare That Tree," which has also been set to music. Although the productions of Morris are now for the most part neglected, during his activity he enjoyed a high literary reputation.

WE were boys together
And never can forget
The schoolhouse near the heather
In childhood where we met;
The humble home to memory dear,
Its sorrows and its joys,
Where woke the transient smile or tear
When you and I were boys.

We were youths together
And castles built in air
Your heart was like a feather
And mine weighed down with care;
To you came wealth with manhood's prime;
To me it brought alloys,
Foreshadowed in the primrose time,
When you and I were boys.

We're old men together,
The friends we loved of yore
With leaves of autumn weather
Are gone forevermore.
How blest to age the impulse given,
The hope time ne'er destroys,
Which led our thoughts from earth to heaven,
When you and I were boys!

The Esch-Townsend Bill And the Railroad Rates

By GEORGE R. PECK, Prominent Chicago Attorney

I CONCEDE that congress may fix rates for interstate transportation. Whether it can DELEGATE THAT POWER to a commission is another question, and whether it can give to a commission executive, judicial and legislative powers is a greater and more difficult one. I think it probable that the rate making power may be delegated by congress to a commission, but only because the supreme court has indulged in dicta to that effect.

A bill (the Esch-Townsend) passed the lower house of congress rapidly without any deliberation, as if it were the mere regulation of interstate baseball contests, but the great interests of the country, agricultural, mercantile, manufacturing and mining, are awakening to the obvious fact that they are being deceived and led away by the Niagara cataract talk of gentlemen who have no knowledge of OR INTEREST IN this great question.

It is certainly not practicable, even if it were wise, to endeavor by legislation to eliminate the activities which lie at the basis of commerce, trade and traffic and to substitute in their place the RIGID CONTROL AND REGULATION of a paternal government. That is the Chinese method.

The bill which passed the house and was considered by the senate for several months does not possess a SINGLE merit of statesmanship. I do not say this with any desire to indulge in unfair criticism, but it was so plainly driven through the house under whip and spur that no one finds it consistent with fair treatment of all interests concerned to defend it.

THE MORE IT IS DISCUSSED THE MORE FLAGRANTLY OUTRAGEOUS DO ITS PROVISIONS APPEAR. THAT IT CAN EVER BECOME A LAW IN THE UNITED STATES WHILE THE PEOPLE REMAIN CLOTHED IN THEIR RIGHT MINDS IS MORE THAN I CAN BELIEVE.

RHAPSODY

By William S. B. Braithewaite

I AM glad day long for the gift of song
For time and change and sorrow;
For the sunset wings and the world end things
Which hang on the edge of tomorrow.
I am glad for my heart whose gates apart
Are the entrance place of wonders,
Where dreams come in from the rush and din
Like sheep from the rains and thunders.

SUCCESS

By Emily Dickinson

EMILY DICKINSON was born at Amherst, Mass., in 1830. Her father, Edward Dickinson, was the treasurer of Amherst college. Miss Dickinson lived a very retired and secluded life—indeed, her poems portray a mind in harmony with nature; one full of quaint fancies and conceits. She died at Amherst in 1886.

SUCCESS is counted sweetest
By those who ne'er succeed.
To comprehend a nectar
Requires sorest need.

Not one of all the purple host
Who took the flag today
Can tell the definition
So clear of victory

As he, defeated, dying,
On whose forbidden ear
The distant strains of triumph
Break, agonized and clear.

EXCURSIONS TO THE WEST

To the Pacific Coast—to California, Oregon, Washington—round-trip, long transit and return limits, liberal stop-over privileges.

The rate is practically on the basis of one fare for the round trip. Of course, if you wish to visit both California and Oregon or Washington, the cost is slightly more.

These reduced rates are in effect on certain dates in months of May to October, inclusive. They apply from all Eastern points via Chicago, St. Louis or Memphis gateways. The Rock Island System will take you up in either Chicago or St. Louis, or at hundreds of other Middle West points and carry you to the Coast in through Standard or Tourist Sleepers with unexcelled Dining Car service. The Rock Island also affords a choice of routes: on the "Scenic" route you can stop off in Colorado—see Salt Lake City—visit Yellowstone National Park; on the "Southern" route you can go via El Paso, thru New Mexico, then "up coast" to San Francisco and on to Portland or Seattle if desired.

In short, these Pacific Coast excursions offer an unusually good chance to see our western country in a comprehensive manner.

If you desire to go only as far as Colorado, there are excursion rates in effect to that section and return, all summer long, specially reduced June 30 to July 4, August 12 and 13, and August 30 to September 4. Extension trips to Ogden or Salt Lake and return at low cost also.

From September 15 to October 31, 1905, one-way tourist or "colonist" tickets will be on sale to California and the Pacific Northwest—about half regular fare.

If interested, send name and address on this coupon, designating which booklet wanted and to what point you plan to go. Name probable date of start also, so we can advise definitely with respect to rates, etc.
